I. Ordinary Language:

1. Not clean; foul, dirty, filthy.

2. Morally foul or impure; wicked, evil; hence, lewd, unchaste.

"Let them all encircle him about, And, fairy-like too, pinch the unclean knight."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives of Windsor, IV. 4.

II. Comparative Religions:

1. Ethnicism: In every ceremonial faith which exists or has existed, distinction exists between what is ceremonially clean and unclean. Food cooked by a Sudra or by an outcast is unclean to the Brahmin, and it is at the peril of his caste if he eat it. He must also avoid neclean persons, as the Pariah, the Mahar, and other outcasts.

2. Judaism: Both things on the one hand, and persons or beings on the other, might be ceremonially unclean. Regarding things, there were unclean places (Lev. xiv. 40), but the word unclean was especially applied to certain articles of food, as the flesh of animals which had died of disease, or been strangled by man, or killed by beasts or birds of prey, certain animals in all circumstances [UNCLEAN-ANIMALS], and blood. (Lev. v. 2, 3; xi. 40, 41; xvii. 10-16; Acts v. 29.) Regarding persons, one might be made unclean by touching the carcass of an unclean animal of any kind (Lev. v. 2; xi. 26). In some cases this ceremonial defilement was but temporary, continuing only till the evening (xi. 25-28, &c.). Washing the clothes was often an essential step towards the removal of the impurity. A woman giving birth to a man-child was unclean for seven days (xii. 2), and to a female child for fourteen days (xii. 5), the period of uncleanness being much shorter than that of her purification (xii. 4, 6). The leper was unclean till the priest pronounced that his loathsome malady was at an end. (Lev. xiii. 1-59.) [UNCLEAN SPIRIT.]

3. Christianity: Jesus swept away the doctrine that the eating of certain articles of food, deemed ceremonially impure, involved sin, by his sweeping declaration: "Not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man" (Matt. xv. 11; cf. also 12-20; Mark vii. 18); and with regard to persons, St. Peter, after the vision of the sheet let down, would no longer call any man common or neclean (Acts x. 28).

Jewish Antiq.: Certain animals which were regarded as ceremonially unclean, and were therefore to be eaten. Most animals that "chew the cud" might be eaten, with the exception of the camel, the coney [HYRAX], the hare, and the swine, only the first of which is a true ruminant. A number of birds—the "eagle," the "ossifrage," the "vulture," the "kite," &c.—were to be deemed unclean and abominable. Much difficulty arises in identifying some of the birds referred to; but one broad fact is undoubted—that the Raptors were deemed ceremonially impure, while most of the grain-feeding birds were allowed as articles of food. Unclean fishes were those which had not fins or scales. With the exception of what would now be called the Leaping Orthoptera—locusts, grasshoppers, &c.—most insects were unclean, as were most creeping things, from verterbrate reptiles to molluscone snails. Not merely were the unclean animals to be rejected as articles of food, their carcasses were to be avoided, as the individual touching them would be unclean (Lev. xi. 1-47). Apart from the ceremonial law, the flesh of the prohibited animals was generally less wholesome than that of those allowed.

New Test.: A demon, a wicked spirit, seizing on and acting through men (Matt. x. 1; Mark I. 27, lll. 30; v. 13, vl. 7; Luke iv. 36; Acta v. 16, vill. 7; Rev. xvi. 13). [POSSESSION, II. 3, POSSESSION-THEORY.]

2. Geol.: The term used when one series of beds is so placed over another that the superior beds repose more or less on the edges instead of on the planes of the inferior series. Thus on the borders of Wales and Shropshire the alaty beds of the Silurian system are curved or vertical, while those of the overlying carboniferous shale and limestone are horizontal. To produce unconformity, three series of events have generally occurred. First, the inferior beds, originally laid down horizontally, must at some subsequent time have been tilted up by a force, probably igneous, from beneath. Secondly, in most cases, the upturned ends of the strata must have been more or less acted on by denudation, which has rendered them a nearly horizontal plane on which fresh strata can easily rest. Thirdly, these fresh strata have been actually deposited. Approximately to measure the interval of time which these changes have occupied, intermediate beds must be sought for in other districts or regions, or failing these, note must be taken of the amount of alteration in life which has occurred during the unknown interval. This may be determined by comparing the fossils in the lower with those in the upper beds. Unconformability is of since in fixing the date of ancient seismic or volcanic action. If it tilted up the lower and had no influence on the upper strata, the irreassible inference is that it occurred before the deposition of the two.

Philos.: A system introduced by E. v. Hartmann (born in Berlin 1840), who published his Die Philosophie des Unbewussten in 1869. He assumes that there is in nature an unconscious Will and Idea (= the Substance of Spinoza, the Absolute Ego of Fichte, the Absolute Subject-object of Schelling, the Absolute Idea of Plato and Hegel, and the Will of Schopenhauer) as a pure and spiritual activity, without a substratum of nerve and brain, which is the basis of consciousness. The product of this Will and Idea is the world.

Law: A phrase used specially in connection with parliamentary or municipal voting or the making of a will. In the first case it consists of any force, violence, restraint, threat, to inflict injury or intimidation, designed to coerce a person into voting for a particular candidate, or abstaining from voting at all, or as an infliction because of his having done so. The perpetrator exposes himself to a legal penalty; and if he can in any sense be considered an agent of the candidate the election is rendered void. If undue influence is proved against a candidate he is disqualified from taking his seat in the legislative body to which he may have been elected. In the case of a will, undue influence is exerted when one acquires such an ascendancy over the testator's mind as to prevent the latter from being a free agent. If he spontaneously bequeath money to one whom he esteems or loves, the esteem or affection do not constitute undue influence. Impunity does. When undue influence is proved the will becomes void.

Optics: The generally accepted theory which traces light to vibrations set up and transmitted as waves in an invisible medium termed the luminiferous ether. This, it is assumed, is (sensibly) imponderable, and almost infinitely elastic, and fills all space, passing freely through the pores or between the atoms of bodies as the wind does through the trees, but having its motions, in a somewhat analogous manner, hindered or modified thereby, and thus accounting for the retardation which is the principal factor in producing Refraction (q.v.). Luminous bodies are believed to be (and in the case of heated luminous bodies are known to be) in a state of intense molecular vibration, and these successive impulses communicated to the ether give rise to successive waves of radiant energy, whose effects on other bodies depend upon their rate, as the pitch of a sound does. The slower periods apparently cause heating effects only; more rapid impulses produce luminous and chemical effects as well, and energetic chemical action is exerted by waves far too rapid to produce luminous impressions. Within the luminous range each rate produces on the normal retina the sensation of one given colour only, while a proportion of all periods mixed produces that of white. In the phenomena of Reflection, Refraction, Dispersion, and ordinary Interference, there is nothing to define the direction of the actual ethereal vibrations; but the facts of Polarization (q.v.) demonstrate that these must be at right angles to the path of the ray, which again implies that the ether, rare and subtle as it is, must have the chief distinguishing quality of a solid, or resemble a thin but solid jelly rather than a fluid. This is believed to be the case, and the ether is also believed to be the medium through which electricity and other forms of energy are transmitted. The Undulatory Theory is usually ascribed to Huyghens, but was firmly established by the convincing experiments and reasoning of Young and Fresnel. Newton adopted the Corpuscular Theory, but in the second edition of his Opticks he added "queries" showing that later he was very strongly disposed to adopt the other.

"The Unemployed: A collective term, embracing all persons in humble circumstances who are out of employment. These may be divided into three classes: (1) Those who are unable to work, either through age, accident, or disease; (2) Those who are willing to work but cannot find employment; and (3) Those who will not work under any circumstances. The unemployed who fall under the third category form a large and dangerous class in all our cities and in the country at large. In the latter they have the significant name of tramp, and form a large body of peripatetic beggars, few of whom are willing to work under any contingency. In the cities they are one of the most dangerous classes, being ready to take advantage of any strike or popular excitement, and often bringing worthy causes into disrepute by their illegal acts. Of the worthy unemployed there is always a considerable number in the congested cities of modern times, and in periods of business depression, like that of 1893-94, an army of them exists, who unavoidably become a heavy and distressing burden on the community. Great sums of money are subscribed by the generous for the alleviation of the distress on such occasions, but in all such cases much suffering unavoidably results. The great strikes which are now becoming so common form another source of this public evil, which is undoubtedly added to greatly in the United States by the rapid influx of unskilled foreigners, many of them from the normally idle class.

"The unemployed are formed from many different classes, from many diverse elements; and we get no nearer to understanding their condition, to say nothing of improving it, if we persist in treating them as though they were all of a single type, and that type one which is in no degree representative."—St. James's Gazette, Dec. 22, 1887.

Of the horn drinking cups were formed, and those who used them were said not to be subject to spasm, epilepsy, or the effects of poison. Unicorns were said to be very swift and strong, not naturally fierce, but when provoked they fought desperately with horns, heels, and teeth, so that it was impossible to take them alive. Browne (Vulgar Errors, bk. III., ch. xxiii.) enumerates five kinds of unicorna: "the Indian ox, the Indian ass, the rhinoceros, the oryx, and that which was more eminently termed monoceros or unicornis;" and in the same chapter he quotes descriptions of this mythical animal from various authors. He describes it as of a reddish colour, of the size of a small horse, of the slender make of a gazelle, and furnished with a long, straight, slender horn in the male, which is wanting in the female. Some added that it had divided hoofs, while others declared it to be single-hoofed. Three Arabs told Ruppell that they had seen the animal in question. All these stories have probably some foundation in fact, to which a large superstructure of fiction has been added. ¶ Act of Uniformity:

Church. Hist.: The Act 13 & 14 Car. II., c. 4, designed to regulate the terms of membership in the Church of England and in the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge. Both the Anglican and the Puritan parties had desired their faith to be that of the Church of England, and Charles II., who, as a step to obtaining his father's throne, wished to stand well with both parties, promised at Breda to use his influence to bring about a certain measure of comprehension. But the Parliament was in no mood to vote for such a scheme, and the Act of Uniformity required the clergy to sign the Thirty-nine Articles and to use the Book of Common Prayer. The enforcement of these regulations led to the secession from the Church of England of upwards of 2,000 clergymen, and laid the foundation of modern dissent. The Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, passed July 18, 1872, somewhat modified that of Charles, as the University Test Act, passed June, 1871, had done the year before.

5. That which is united or made into one body; a body formed by the combination or uniting of two or more individual things or persons; the aggregate of the united parts; a combination, a coalition, a confederacy; as

(1) A confederacy of two or more nations, or of several states in one nation; as, The United States of America are called the Union. This state of union was accomplished by means of the United States Constitution, adopted in 1787; the states having been previously practically independent, or very feebly combined. After the Revolutionary War they remained associated, but by a slight bond that was sure to cause discontent, and it quickly became evident that either a stronger central government must be organized, or the several states each become an independent nation. The latter expedient was so dangerous a one, that there was common consent to the formation of a strong central government, and the Constitution was adopted, combining the states into what is known as the Union.

(2) Two or more parishes consolidated into one for Administration of the Poor Laws. (Eng.)

* (3) (See extract):

"Union is a combining or consolidation of two churches in one, which is done by the consent of the bishop, the patron, and incumbent. And this is properly called an union; but there are two other sorts, as when one church is made subject to the other, and when one man is made prelate of both, and when a conventual is made cathedral. Touching union in the first signification, there was a statute, an. 37 Hen. VIII., ch. 2, that it should be lawful in two churches, whereof the value of the one is not above six pounds in the king's books, of the first fruits, and not above one mile distant from the other. Union in this signification is personal, and that is for the life of the incumbent; or real, that is perpetual, whose-ever is incumbent."—Cowel.

(4) A trades-union (q.v.).

6. A contraction of union-workhouse [WORKHOUSE.]

7. A kind of device for a flag, used either by itself or forming the upper inner corner of an ensign; a flag marked with this device.

"As the patron saint of England, the banner of St. George ever ranked highly. In heraldic language, it was Argent, a cross gules, &c., a white flag with a plain red cross (the Plantagenet colours, white and red). It appears to have been very early adopted as a national ensign. Coins and seals of the time of Edward III. and Henry V. are impressed with the figure of a ship bearing this flag at the bow and stern, and the portrait of the 'Great Harry' exhibits it at the fore and main. The national flag of Scotland, or banner of St. Andrew, was azure, a saltire argent, &c., a white saltire or St. Andrew's Cross on a blue field.

On the union with Scotland in 1707 these flags were combined; the red cross of St. George, diminished, argent, that is, with a white border to the cross, being laid upon the St. Andrew's banner, and thus it appears in the portrait of the 'Sovereign of the Seas' (Greenwich Hospital) a white border to the cross, being the union with Ireland, in 1801, the banner of St. Patrick, which is a red saltire cross on a white field, was laid upon that of St. Andrew's, and upon these the augmented cross of St. George—comprising the flag now known to be as the Union Jack. In 1707 the Union as the main became, and remains to this day, the distinguishing flag of an Admiral of the Fleet. It was thus carried by Lord Howe on the 1st of June [1794], and by Earl St. Vincent in 1805 and 1808. Merchant vessels are prohibited from carrying this flag without a white border under a penalty of £500."—Field, Sept. 24, 1887.

"But I had better give the words of the heraldic blazon contained in the Order of the King in Council of Nov. 5, 1800, and announced to the nation by the Proclamation of Jan. 1, 1801, which prescribes the form in which the national flag is to be constructed. It is in these words: 'The Union flag shall be azure, the crosses saltires of Saint Andrew and Saint Patrick, quarterly per saltire, counterchanged, argent and gules; the latter surmounted of the second, surmounted by the cross of St. George of the third, fimbriated as the saltire, &c.' One word more. Your correspondents must not call our national flag the Union Jack. The Jack is a small flag—a diminutive of the Union—only flown from the jack staff on the lower end or forepart of a ship. In the Royal Navy it is plain, and in the merchant service it must have a white border. It is the signal for a pilot, and is called the Pilot Jack. To no other flag is the term Jack applied. The name of our national flag is the Union."—Field, Oct. 4, 1887.

II. Technically:

1. Arith.: The least whole number or one, represented by the figure 1. Numbers are collections of things of the same kind, each of which is a unit of the collection. Thus 20 feet is a collection of 20 equal spaces, each of which is equal to 1 foot; here 1 foot is the unit or base of the collection.

2. Math. & Physics: Any known determinate quantity by the constant repetition of which any other quantity of the same kind is measured. It may be a length, a surface, a solid, a weight, a time, as the case may be.

* I. Abstract unit: The unit of numeration; the abstract unit 1 is the measure of the relation of equality of two numbers. It is the base of the system of natural numbers, and incidentally the base of all quantities.

2. Decimal & duodecimal units: Those in scales of numbers increasing or decreasing by ten or twelve respectively.

3. Dynamic units:

(1) Unit of force: A dyne; a force which, acting for one second on a mass of one gramme, gives to it a velocity of one centimetre per second.

(2) Unit of work done: A watt (q.v.); the power developed when 4425 foot pounds are done per minute = one 746th part of a horsepower. [FOOT-POUND, KILOGRAMMETRE.]

4. Electric units:

(1) Unit of quantity: A coulomb. The quantity of electricity that will liberate .000162 grains of hydrogen from water, or .005232 grains of zinc from a solution of the metal. In this unit, rate or time is taken no account of.

(2) Unit of current: An ampere; a current flowing at the rate of one coulomb per second, or liberating .000162 grains of hydrogen, &c., per second.

(4) Unit of resistance: The legal unit of resistance, as settled by the International Electrical Congress, at Paris, 1884, is that of a column of pure mercury 106 centimetres long, 1 square millimetre in sectional area at 0° C. The name ohm is now confined to this unit, but was formerly used to denote an older unit chosen by the British Association, which is to the legal ohm as 1.0112 to 1.

(5) Unit of capacity: A farad (q.v.). A condenser has a capacity of one farad when a potential difference of one volt between its two sets of plates charges each of them with one coulomb.

(6) Absolute units: The absolute electro-motive force unit is a force, and the absolute unit magnetic pole is a pole, which, when placed at a distance of one centimetre, from a similar force or pole, repels it with a force of one dyne. One volt = 10⁸ absolute units.

(7) Unit of work done: The watt (q.v.); the rate at which electrical work is done is measured by watta. A watt is the power developed in the circuit when one ampere of current produces one volt difference of potential at the terminals. [¶ 3. (2).]

5. Fractional unit: The unit of a fraction. Thus in the fraction 1/2 there is an assemblage of three units, each of which is one-fourth of the whole number.

11. Unit of measure: The unit of measure of any quantity is a quantity of the same kind, with which the quantity is compared.

12. Unit of value: In the United States a gold dollar, weighing 25.8 grains, one-tenth of which is alloy; in England a gold sovereign, weighing 123.274 grains, one-eleventh being alloy.

unit-jar, s.

A. As substantive:

1. Theology & Church History:

(1) A name adopted by those members of the Christian Church who conceive of the Godhead as impersonal and regard the Father as the only God. The term first appeared in a decree of the Transylvanian Diet, Oct. 25, 1600, and was adopted by the Transylvanian Unitarians, to designate their church, in 1638. This body now forms the Hungarian Unitarian Church, with about 6,000 members. Unitarianism has made some progress in other parts of Europe, and has at the present time about 320 congregations in Great Britain. Unitarian tendencies appeared in the American Colonies early in the eighteenth century, in some of the Puritan congregations of New England; and in 1783 the Rev. James Freeman, of the Episcopal Church of King's Chapel, Boston, expurgated from the Book of Common Prayer all allusion to the Trinity, or to any Supreme Being but the Father. This, therefore, became the first distinctly Unitarian Church in the United States. At the same time, however, many of the Congregational Churches were ceasing to use the Trinitarian formula. Among the Unitarians of that period was John Adams, who affirmed that many of the clergy and the intelligent laity shared his views. In 1794 the famous Dr. Priestley, who had left England to escape persecutions on account of his liberal religious views, came to Philadelphia, and gave a course of lectures on "The Corruptions of Christianity," the outcome of which was the formation of an Unitarian society in that city. In 1801 the church at Plymouth, Mass., that established by the Pilgrims from the Mayflower, and the oldest in New England, declared itself Unitarian by a large majority of the congregation. During the first twenty years of the nineteenth century there was a rapid growth of Unitarianism in New England, principally within the Congregational Church. In 1815 Dr. Channing came forward as an Unitarian divine, and by his elevated ethical ideas gave a new impetus to the movement. His Baltimore sermon (1819) marks the cleavage between the Unitarian and orthodox sections of the Congregational body. Since that period Unitarianism has continued to grow in New England, and has become particularly strong in Boston, which possesses more than 25 out of the 400 American churches belonging to the sect. Harvard College, while not a denominational institution, is under Unitarian control. Outside of New England Unitarianism has not grown rapidly. The Philadelphia society organized in 1794, had developed into but two congregations in 1894. In the west, however, there is considerable growth. In addition to the Unitarians proper are the Hicksite section of the Quakers, the Christians (a Baptist body), and the Christian Disciples, all more or less Unitarian in doctrine.

(2) A general term for all non-Trinitarian Christians, whether they have themselves used the name or not: Some of the ante-Nicene Fathers, the Sabellians, Arius and his followers, the Photinians, &c., have been included in this designation. At the Reformation period Servetus and others, and subsequently Faustus Socinus and his school, are thus described by later writers. In England, Bartholomew Legate, the last person burned at Smithfield (1612); John Bill, who gathered a London congregation during the Commonwealth; Samuel Clarke, D.D.; whose Scripture Doctrines of the Trinity (1712) had powerful influence, have all been reckoned Unitarians; and the name has been applied to writers like Milton, Locke, and Newton.

(3) Any non-Christian monotheist. The Jews are sometimes called Unitarians; and Wesley uses the expression "Unitarian fiend" in his Hymn for the Mahometans.

2. Philos. (Pl.): A name for a special class of Realists.

*The Realists or Substantialists are again divided into Dualists, and into Unitarians or Monists, according as they are, or are not, contented with the testimony of consciousness to the ultimate duplicity of subject and object in perception."—Hamilton: Metaphysics, i. 225.

B. As adjective:

1. Theol., Church Hist., &c.: Pertaining to or connected with Unitarians, in the several senses defined above.

2. Philos.: Holding the unity of subject and object in perception.

3. Polit.: Favouring a plan of union. In continental politics first used of the party in favour of a united Italy; then applied in the case of Germany, the Slavs, &c.

Ū-ni-tār-i-an-ism, s. [Ecclies. Lat. & Ger. unitarismus; Fr. unitarisme; Ital. unitarismo, unitaresimo, unitarianesimo; Wel. undodiath.]

Theology & Church History:

1. A collective name for the views of Unitarians. Unitarians have no formulated test of membership, and have always shown great varieties of opinion. The Arian school has little influence, except in Ireland. The Socinian theology, with its worship of Christ, has never been completely adopted in Great Britain or America. Priestley's Unitarianism included a determinist philosophy and a strong element of supernaturalism. The return to a spiritual philosophy was initiated by Channing. Many of his followers, influenced by Emerson and Parker, have done their best to relieve Christianity of its supernatural ingredients. All own a spiritual allegiance to Christ, though varying as to the nature and extent of his authority. Appealing to Scripture as a witness for their views, Unitarians have generally limited revelation to the communication of spiritual data. They reject a substitutionary atonement, and are usually advocates of a universal restoration.

2. The Unitarian cause. Unitarianism as an organized interest has never taken large proportions, and it is not easy to estimate its actual strength. It has produced a number of influential men, far in excess of its denominational importance; and the stress which it lays on individuality, while checking its progress, has added to its power. By the Toleration Act (1689) the open preaching of Unitarianism was forbidden in Great Britain, a legal disability not removed till 1813.

United Greeks, s. pl.

Church Hist.: A comprehensive name including all those who follow the Greek rite, and at the same time acknowledge the authority of the Pope. These are (1) the Melchites (q.v.) in the East, (2) the Ruthenians (q.v.), (3) the Greek Catholics of Italy, whose clergy are allowed to marry when in minor orders, and continue in the married state after they are priests, but are forbidden, under pain of deposition, to contract a second marriage. These Greeks, about 30,000 in number, have three seminaries, each with a resident Greek bishop to ordain the priests, but otherwise they are subject to the bishop in whose diocese they live. United Presbyterian Church, s.

Ecclies. & Church Hist.: The third in point of magnitude and importance among the Presbyterian denominations in Scotland, the two in advance of it in point of numbers being the Established and the Free Churches. It was formed by the union between the Secession and the Relief bodies on May 13, 1847. Its tenets are essentially those of the Confession of Faith, with modifications needful to adapt it to the views of its ministers as to the relation of the civil magistrate to the church and religious toleration. Nearly all its office-bearers are opposed to the principle of establishments, but latitude of belief on the subject is permitted, and a minority hold the opposite view. In May, 1876, the United Presbyterian Church made a friendly disavowance of its congregations south of the Tweed that these might unite with the English Presbyterian Church to constitute the Presby-

It has foreign missions in the West Indies, in South Africa, &c., in India, China, and Japan.

United Provinces, s.

Geog. & Hist.: The provinces of Guelderland, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht and Friesland, which united in 1579, and became the nucleus of the Dutch republic.

United States, s. pl.

Geog. & Hist.: The forty-five states of North America, composing the federal republic whose official title is the United States of America, and which comprises in addition to its states four organized territories, the unorganized Indian Territory, and the federal District of Columbia. The United States is the largest republic and one of the largest nations in the world. It embraces nearly one-half of the North American continent, and, including Alaska, has an area nearly equal to that of Europe. The total area is 3,557,009 square miles. The country extends (east and west) from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, with an extreme length of about 2700 miles; and (north and south) from Canada to Mexico and the Gulf of Mexico, with an extreme width of about 1600 miles. The population in 1890 was 62,971,081. It is at present (1894) about 68,000,000. In 1790 there were but 13 states, with less than 4,000,000 population, and an area of about 400,000 square miles. The progress of the United States in wealth has been equally unprecedented, and it is today the richest country upon the face of the globe. Through the eastern and western sections of the country run two important mountain systems, the Appalachian and the Rocky Mountains, between which lies a vast plain, abundantly watered, and remarkable for its fertility and the variety of its productions. The districts bordering the oceans are equally prolific, while in the Rocky Mountain region lies a vast arid district, to some extent reclaimable by irrigation, but particularly valuable for its richness in gold and silver. The Appalachian region is equally valuable for its immense stores of coal and iron, while copper, lead, and other metals are elsewhere abundant.

The government of the United States embraces three departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. The executive comprises a President and Vice-President, elected for four years, and a number of Cabinet officials, or Secretaries of Departments, chosen by, and forming the advisory council of, the President. The legislative department consists of a Senate (embracing two members from each state), and a House of Representatives, elected by popular vote to represent districts of approximately equal population. The judicial department is known as the Supreme Court, whose function it is to decide upon the constitutionality of the laws. The general government has control of commerce and all relations with foreign powers, of the army and navy, the post-offices and the coinage of money, and has the sole power to declare war and conclude peace.

The separate states have similar organizations, each having its own constitution, executive, legislative, and supreme court. They are divided into counties, with local powers of government, and these again into townships, boroughs, cities, &c. The cities largely control their own affairs, each having a mayor and a law-making body. The United States is thus organized on the principle of a general government for general interests, and successively descending state and local governments for state and local interests. The other republics of America are organized on the same general principle, having taken the United States as their model.

In the Greek drama the three unities required were those of action, of time, and of place. This so-called Aristotelian law of unity required that there should be no shifting of the scene from place to place, that the whole series of events should be such as might occur within the space of a single day, and that nothing should be admitted irrelevant to the development of the single plot.

"The unities of time, place, and action are exactly observed."—Dryden: All for Love. (Pref.)

"Unity of possession is a joint possession of two rights by several titles. For example, I take a lease of land from one upon a certain rent; afterwards I buy the fee-simple. This is a unity of possession, whereby the lease is extinguished; by reason that I, who had before the occupation only for my rent, am become lord of the same, and am to pay my rent to one."—Cowell.

(2) The holding of the same estate in undivided shares by two or more; joint tenancy.

3. Math.: An entire collection, considered as a single thing. Thus, 20 feet, considered as a single distance, is unity; 1 foot is the unit of the expression. The number 1, when unconnected with anything else, is generally called unity.

Chem.: Equivalent to one unit of any standard, specially to one atom of hydrogen. [MONAD, II. 1.]

ü-ní-valve, a. & s. [Pref. uni-, and Eng. valve.]

A. As adj.: Having only one valve, as a shell or pericarp.

B. As substantive:

Zool.: A popular name for any of the Gasteropoda (q.v.) inclosed in a univalve shell, which may be regarded essentially as a cone, the apex of which is more or less oblique. In the simplest form the conical shape is retained without any alteration, as is the case with the common limpet.

In the majority of instances univalves have the conical shell considerably elongated, so as to form a tube, which may retain this shape, but is usually coiled up into a spiral, and this latter form may be regarded as the typical shell of the Gasteropoda. In some (as in Vermetus) the coils or whorls are hardly in contact, but more commonly they are so amalgamated that the inner side of each convolution is formed by the pre-existing whorl. When the whorls are coiled round a central axis in the same plane, the shell is said to be discoidal, as in Planorbis (q.v.); but, in most cases, they are wound obliquely round the axis, and the shell is termed turreted, trochoid, or turritated, fusiform, &c. The animal withdraws into its shell by a retractile muscle, which passes into the foot or is attached to the operculum, its scar or impression being placed in the Spiral Univalves, upon the columella. In the Marine Univalves two important variations exist in the form of the mouth of the shell. In one group, the Holostomata (q.v.), it is unbroken and entire, and these animals live for the most part on vegetable food; in the other group, the Siphonostomata (q.v.), which are mainly carnivorous, the aperture of the shell is notched in front. The shell figured is fusiform; the apex (A) mammillated; the whorls (w) ventricose, strongly ribbed or corrugated, with discontinuous varices (v), and distinct sutures (st); the columella (c) is denticulated; the outer lip (o) is internally plicato-dentate; the body-whorls (b w) are large, and the aperture (a) ovately elliptical; a c and p c mark the anterior and posterior canals respectively.

UNIVALVE.
(Shell of the genus Triton.)

This class (Gasteropoda) includes all those molluscan animals which are known as Tritons, such as Land-snails, Sea-snails, Whelks, Limpets, &c.—Nicholson: Palaeont., II. 1.

universal-agent, s.

Law: An agent authorized to do for a principal all the acts which the latter can lawfully delegate. Such devolution of authority very rarely takes place. (Story Agency.)

universal-chuck, s. A chuck having movable dogs on a face-plate to adapt them to grasp objects of varying sizes.

Universal Church, s.

Theol.: The Church of God throughout the world. [CATHOLIC.]

universal-compass, s. A compass with tubular legs containing extension-pieces, which may be drawn out to strike a large circle, and fixed at the required length by screws. The extension-pieces are also tubular, each receiving either leg of a small bow-compass, one having a plain point and pen and the other a plain point and pencil-holder; these are used as parts of the large compass, but both may be withdrawn and used independently for drawing small circles.

universal-coupling, s. A form of coupling in which the parts united are capable of assuming various angular relations to each other. A gimbal-joint is a familiar instance.

universal-dial, s. A dial by which the hour may be found by the sun in any part of the world, or under any elevation of the pole.

It is a sort of reflecting circle, in which a spirit-level with a very small bubble is so placed that by means of a lens and a totally reflecting prism an image of the bubble is formed at the focus of the telescope, and the coincidence of the centre of that image with the cross-wire shows when the line of collimation is truly horizontal.

Mach.: A device for connecting two objects, as the ends of two shafts, so as to allow them universal prime-meridian, s.

Astron., &c.: The meridian of Greenwich, adopted at an International Conference of scientific men, held at Washington, D. C., in 1883. Till that time nearly every country had its own prime meridian—that of England was Greenwich, and that of France Paris; hence an English and a French ship, meeting at sea, would find that there would be a difference of 2° 20' between the records of their longitude, since Paris is 2° 20' east of Greenwich. The conference decided that this anomaly should be abolished, and that longitude should be reckoned only from the meridian of Greenwich, and that it should count 180° east and 180° west; so that in future all maps will be constructed on this principle, and ships of every nation, meeting at sea, will find themselves in the same degree of longitude. [UNIVERSAL-TIME.]

universal-proposition, s.

Logic: A proposition in which the predicate is said of the whole of the subject: Thus, All tyrants are miserable, is a universal affirmative proposition (having the symbol A); No miser is rich, is a universal negative proposition (having the symbol O). [See also examples under UNIVERSAL, II, 1.]

universal-religion, s.

Compar. Relig.: A missionary religion (q.v.); a faith intended to be preached to all men, as distinguished from a tribal or national cult.

universal-successor, s.

Scots Law: An heir who succeeds to the whole of the heritage of a person who dies intestate.

universal-suffrage, s.

Hist.: Suffrage which accords a vote to every man in the community. It is called in France Plebiscite (q.v.). It exists in the United States, and in some other countries, being confined to male citizens. Advocates of women's suffrage contend that a franchise confined to men is not universal.

universal-time, s.

Astron. &c.: A method of reckoning time for international purposes, agreed on by the International Conference, held at Washington, in 1883. Universal time is reckoned from mean noon at the universal prime-meridian (q.v.), the day commencing at midnight, and being divided into twenty-four (instead of into two portions of twelve) hours each. Local time is still used for local purposes; but the method of fixing it is changed. Since the earth is divided into 360° and the day into 24 hours, every 15° represents the difference of an hour in time. The meridian at Greenwich being taken as the zero line, or the centre of the zero zone, the United States is divided into four zones, in which the time is designated as follows: Eastern time (67½° to 82½° west longitude), Central time (82½° to 97½°), Mountain time (97½° to 112½°), and Pacific time (112½° to 127½°). Within each of these zones the time changes by one hour. Thus when it is 12 o'clock at Philadelphia, it is 11 at Chicago, 10 at Denver, and 9 at San Francisco, and the same at any point within the respective zones. This system, adopted for convenience in making railroad time tables, has proved so advantageous that other countries are following the United States in applying Standard-time. Universal-time, so far as concerns the twenty-four hour day, has as yet made little progress, being principally confined to astronomers. It is used in Italy and some other countries, and must extend, through its convenience in making railroad time tables, etc. [STANDARD-TIME.]

universal-umbel, s.

Bot.: An umbel consisting of various partial umbels.

* u-ni-vēr-sā'-lī-an, a. [Eng. universal; -ian.] Of or pertaining to Universalism (q.v.).

Ū-ni-vēr-sal-izm, s. [Eng. universal; -ism.] 1. Church History:

(1) The doctrine held by large numbers of Christians that all men, and also the devil and fallen angels, will be forgiven and will enjoy eternal happiness. This belief is very ancient, and passages implying it may be found in the works of Origen and his followers, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, &c. It is also said to have constituted part of the creed of the Lollards, Albigenses, and Waldenses. Among the English divines who have held some form of this doctrine are Tillotson, Burnet, and William Law, and more recently the late Professor F. D. Maurice. All Unitarians hold it, and some of the Universalists agree with the Unitarians in rejecting the doctrine of the Trinity. The Universalists ground their reasons for their doctrine in the love of God, who, they say, is only angry with sin, not the sinner, and therefore if the sinner repents even after death his repentance will restore him to God's favour. The sovereignty of God will be finally vindicated by the ultimate harmony of the moral universe, and the submission of all things in heaven and earth to His righteous will. When righteousness is triumphant peace and happiness will prevail; until then pain and suffering will be instruments to work out the will of God. They profess to prove their doctrine from Scripture, quoting in support of it Matt. xxv. 46, John xvii. 8, 1 Cor. xv. 22, Phil. ii. 10, Eph. i. 10, Col. i. 19, 20, and 1 Tim. iv. 10. Universalism is better known as a distinct sect in America than in England. In 1827 a division arose among the American Universalists concerning punishment after death, some asserting it to be limited, while others denied it altogether. Some separated from the main body and called themselves "The Massachusetts Association of Restorationists." Most of them afterwards joined the Free-Will Baptists or the Unitarians, while the others returned to the main body. In 1840 the whole sect divided into two, the impartialists and the Restorationists. But Universalism is also held by many members of other sects, and practically by all Theists strictly so called.

(2) A name sometimes given to Arminianism (q.v.), because it maintains that Christ died for all men, not merely for the elect. [CALVINISM.]

(3) The doctrine that the mission of Christ was to all men, not merely to the Jews; Paulinism (q.v.).

"The Fourth Gospel again . . . is the Gospel of Universalism in the highest degree."—Matthew Arnold: God & the Bible, p. 229.

2. Compar. Relig.: The state or condition of embracing or being suited for the acceptance of all men. [UNIVERSAL-RELIGION.]

"The denial of true universalism to Islam is somewhat contradicted by the fact that it is at the present day spreading more than either Christianity or Buddhism."—Athenaeum, Oct. 14, 1882, p. 490.

u-ni-ver-sit-ty, * u-ni-ver-sit-e, * u-ny-ver-sit-ee, s. [Fr. universit, from Lat. universitatem, accus. of universitas = the whole of anything, the universe; later, an association, corporation, company, &c.; from universus = universal (q.v.); Sp. universidad; Ital. universita.]

* 1. The whole universe; the world.

"Ours tongue is fier, the universities of wickedness." - Wicliffe: James III, 56.

* 2. A corporation, a guild, an association.

3. Now, specifically, an establishment or corporation for the purpose of instruction in all or some of the most important sciences and literature, and having power to confer certain honorary dignities, called degrees, in several faculties, as arts, science, medicine, law, theology, &c. When the term came first to be applied to seminaries of learning it was used to signify either the whole body of learners and teachers, or the whole body of learners, with corporate rights, and under by-laws of their own, divided either by faculty or by country (whence the division into nations in the Scotch and some of the European universities), or both together, the particular meaning being determined by the words with which it was connected. Such phrases as Universitas magistrorum et auditorum (or scholarium), meaning the whole body of teachers and scholars, are met with at the very beginning of the thirteenth century. As applied to Oxford, such an expression is found in a document belonging to the year 1301. In the following century the Latin term universitas acquired a technical sense, and came to be used by itself much in the same sense as we now use the English University. In most cases the corporations constituting universities include a body of teachers or professors for giving instruction to students; but this is not essential to a university, the University of London being simply an examining body. A common idea of a university (founded probably on the word itself, and also on the fact that the best-known universities, as Oxford and Cambridge, consist of several colleges) is that a university is an aggregate or union of several colleges, that is, a great corporation embodying in one several smaller and subordinate collegiate bodies; but such is not necessarily the case, as some universities, such as Dublin, consist of but one college. The three oldest universities are those of Bologna, Paris, and Oxford, the first-named having already acquired great celebrity as a school of law in the early part of the twelfth century. The practice of granting degrees originated at Paris in the second half of the same century. The earliest division of students and teachers was into nations, at Paris there being four and at Bologna seventeen or eighteen nations. The division into faculties did not arise till the thirteenth century. In the United States there has been considerable looseness in the application of the term, the titles university and college being applied indifferently, so that some institutions denominated universities are little more than high schools, while others that are entitled colleges should properly be called universities. In the best universities of this country the course of study will bear comparison with that of any

British university. These include Harvard, Yale, Pennsylvania, and several others. Most of the states have state universities as a part of the educational system, these being, like many of the colleges, open to both sexes. Women have also been admitted, to a partial extent, into several of the older universities. Elective and post-graduate courses have been introduced into several of the larger colleges, and the dividing line between college and university has become difficult to distinguish.

University extension, s. The name given to a scheme by which many of the advantages of university teaching are brought within the reach of the inhabitants of the principal towns of the United States and England. Called also Local Lectures Scheme.

1. The Cambridge scheme: In 1872 the University of Cambridge appointed a syndicate to organize lectures by university men, and conduct classes in suitable places. The lectures are of a similar character to those given at Cambridge, and in addition to being largely attended, have led, in the case of Nottingham and Sheffield, to the establishment of permanent institutions for higher education. There were 100 courses given in 1887, attended by 10,000 students.

2. The American scheme: The University Extension system, as developed at Cambridge, and later at London and elsewhere, has been taken up in the United States, and particularly in Philadelphia, where it has attained an encouraging development. It originated there in the University of Pennsylvania, under whose auspices were established several local centres and others in neighboring towns and cities, the lecturers being University professors, and others who had gained a reputation in connection with the English movement. From Philadelphia the movement has extended to other American cities, and promises to become widely developed, as an aid towards higher education for those who cannot take a regular university course. The Chautauqua course of home reading and study is a movement in the same direction. The course is a four years' one and post-graduate and special course may be taken.

university-tests, s. pl. Tests enforced upon students in the Universities as an essential to their obtaining a degree. These tests, till recently in force, were those prescribed by the Act of Uniformity (UNIFORMITY); an Act for their abolition in the English Universities became law in June 16, 1871. A similar Act for Trinity College, Dublin, was passed in May, 1873. Tests had not been enforced in the Scottish Universities. (English.)

further investigation led to its discovery in all the living Lacertilia in which a parietal foramen exists (Spencer in O. Jour. Micros. Soc., n. s. xxvii.), and it has since been traced in Fishes by Beard of Freilurg (Nature, July 14, 1887). Thus in the same vertebrate animal are eyes developed on the vertebrate and on the invertebrate type, and formed from the modification of the walls of hollows h, and out-growths of, the brain. In Sphenodon, which has been the subject of most of the investigations, this eye has, in section, the shape of a cone, the base of which fills the foramen, while the piteal stalk (p.s.) is connected with the apex. The walls of the optic vesicle (o.v.) are divided into an anterior and a posterior part, the first forming the lens (l), and the other the sensitive structures, all nourished by a bloodvessel (b.v.). The lens is apparently directly the product of the brain-wall itself. The retinal elements (r) are arranged in the manner typical of Invertebrates—the rods lie on the inner side, bounding the cavity of the optic vesicle, the nerve entering posteriorly, and not spreading out in front of the rods. In all living forms this eye is in a state of greater or less degeneration, but it was most probably functional in the Labyrinthodonts in which the parietal foramen was very large, and had its sides corrugated, as if for the attachment of muscles.

¶ On March 4, 1873, Mr. Samuel Pilsoll, M.P. for Derby, moved for a Royal Commission to inquire into the state of the British Shipping Interest as regarded the safety of mariners. A report justifying his apprehensions was drawn out in September. A bill which he subsequently introduced on the subject was rejected on June 24, 1874, but his earnestness led to the introduction of a temporary measure, proposed by Sir C. Adderley, giving further powers to the Board of Trade to stop unseaworthy ships. Similar legislation to prevent the sending to sea of unseaworthy vessels has been passed in the United States and other countries. The evil is one calling for stringent regulations and strict inspection, both as to the condition of vessels and the character of the food provided for seamen. The greed and inhumanity of ship-owners have caused much suffering and loss of life in the directions here indicated, and legislation is still needed in the interests of mariners.

Of her untruth. — Chaucer: Troil. & Cress. bk. v.
3. A false statement or assertion; a falsehood, a lie. (In this sense there is a plural, un-truths.)

"Whom want itself can force untruths to tell."

Pope: Homer; Odyssey xiv. 180.

¶ Untruth is an untrue saying; falsehood is a false saying: untruth of itself reflects no disgrace on the agent; it may be unintentional or not; a falsehood is an intentional false saying; an untruth is not always spoken for the express intention of deceiving. Some persons have a habit of telling falsehoods from the mere love of talking. Children are apt to speak untruths for want of understanding the value of words; travellers from a love of exaggeration are apt to introduce falsehoods into their narrations. Falsehood is also used in the abstract sense for what is false. Falsity is never used out in the abstract sense, for the property of the false. The former is general, the latter particular in the application; the truth or falsehood of an assertion is not always to be distinctly proved; the falsity of any particular person's assertion may be proved by the evidence of others.

It was said to be so deadly that the poison was collected by criminals condemned to death, who obtained their pardon if they brought away the poison, which was, however, found fatal to eighteen out of every twenty who made the attempt. It was destructive to all vegetable life but its own, and grew in the midst of a desert which it had made. It is now known that the upas-tree was credited with the destruction of animal life really attributable to the escape of carbon dioxide from a vent or vents in a valley surrounded by volcanoes. It has been seen growing with other trees in forests, and in 1844 was introduced into British hothouses with no deleterious effect.

This elevation is popularly attributed, as it was by the early geologists, to a recession of the sea; no portion of which, however, could recede without producing a universal fall in the level of the ocean. No known natural cause could produce such a phenomenon, and the popular hypothesis is embarrassed by the necessity of explaining what has become of the water which has disappeared, and why certain strata are not horizontal, but slanted at all angles or disposed in curves. These difficulties do not arise when it is held that the permanent recession of the ocean is only apparent; that water has remained at its own level, and it is the land that has risen. This rise of the land, though often very extensive, is still in each successive case only a local phenomenon. [UP-THROW.]

1. Greek Mythol.: The most ancient of all the gods. He married Terra, or Earth, by whom he had, first, the children called the hundred-handed, Briareus, Cottus, and Gyges; secondly, the Cyclopes, Arges, Steropes, and Brontes; thirdly, the Titans, Oceanus, Coeus, Saturnus, etc.; and lastly, the Giants. He was dethroned and mutilated by his son Saturnus, and from his blood sprang the Furies, Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megera.

2. Astron.: One of the superior planets between Saturn and Neptune. It was not known to the ancients. When Sir William Herschel, after the construction of his great reflecting telescope [TELESCOPE] was systematically examining with it all the stars above a certain magnitude, he, on March 13, 1781, found in the constellation Gemini a star which he recognized as having a disk which the others had not. He took it for a comet, and the other contemporary astronomers held the same view. Some months afterwards, as its motions were traced, the opinion arose that it was a planet, and in January, 1783, La Place laid before the Academy of Science, at Paris, calculations relating to its elliptic orbit which established beyond a doubt that this opinion was correct. The discovery led to the appointment of Herschel as Astronomer-Royal, and the establishment of the observatory at Slough. Uranus had been noted down by Flamsteed as a fixed star, in his Historia Cælestis Britannica, published in 1723, and he had measured its place four or five times between 1690 and 1715. Le Monnier had observed it nine times without identifying it as a planet. Bradley and Tobias Mayer had done so at least once. Its diameter is about 31,700 miles—about four times that of the earth, its bulk about sixty-four times as great; but being of light material its weight is only fifteen times as great. It has been reasoned out from analogy rather than proved by actual observation that it rotates, but the time of this rotation is wholly unknown. Its distance from the sun is about 1,800,000,000 of miles, and it travels once round the orbit in about eighty-seven years. It receives only about one three-thousandth part of the light and heat from the sun which fall upon the earth. It is attended by at least four satellites—Ariel, Umbriel, Titania, and Oberon. Their orbits all lie in the same plane, and are at right angles to the path of the planet itself—a circumstance not known in the case of any other planet. Called also Georgium Sidus and Herschel (q.v.).

It is really the Hind language, which is of the Aryan family, with a number of Persian, Arabic, and Turkish words introduced into it, though the inflections of nouns and verbs remain unaltered. Many consider Urdu a distinct language from Hindi, but Beames regards this as a great error in philology. It is now the language most largely used by Europeans in their intercourse with the natives of India. It has a literature, chiefly historic, which arose under the Mogul emperors, commencing with Akbar (1558-1605).

"By a curious caprice Hindi, when it uses Arabic words, is assumed to become a new language, and is called by a new name - Urdu; but when Punjabi or Siadhi do the same, they are not so treated." - Beames: Comp. Gram. Aryan Lang., i. 82.

*ūre, v.t. [URE (1), s.] To inure; to accustom by use or practice.

ūr-ē-a, s. [Latinised from root of urina = urine (q.v.).]

Chem.: CH4N2O = C = O. The chief organic constituent of urine, first obtained in an impure state by Rouelle the younger, in 1799. It is readily obtained by evaporating urine to dryness on the water-bath and exhausting the residue with alcohol; or it may be prepared synthetically by the action of ammonia upon carbonic oxychloride. From a pure aqueous solution it crystallizes in long, flattened prisms without terminal faces, is soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether, melts at 120°, and decomposes at a higher temperature. The synthesis of urea, discovered by Wöhler in 1828, was the first instance of an undoubtedly organic body being obtained by artificial means.

*ūred, a. [URE (2), s.] Fortunate.

"In my body I was well ūred." Chaucer: Dream.

Urena lobata, a shrub commonly occurring with the mango and bamboo in Bengal and throughout India, and U. sinuata, a small Indian shrub, have strong fibres, probably well adapted for the manufacture of sacking and twine. (Calcutta Exhib. Report.) In Brazil a decoction of the root and stem of U. lobata is employed as a remedy in windy colic, and the flowers are given as an expectorant in dry and inveterate cough.

ūr-rē-t, s. [UREA.]

Chem.: This name has been applied to the group CH2NO, which by substitution for one atom of hydrogen in ammonia, may be supposed to form urea, H2N-C(=O)-NH2, and by substitution for two atoms of hydrogen, biuret, (CH2NO)2-N. (Watts.)

The eggs, are used in Britain for clarifying wine, also as food.

ur̄-ic, a. [Eng. urico (c); -ic.] Contained in or derived from urea (q.v.).

Chem.: C₅H₄N₄O₃. Formerly called lithic acid. A general constituent of the Vertebrata, and usually prepared from serpents' excrements or from guano, by boiling with dilute potassic hydrate, and decomposing by hydrochloric acid. It forms a glistening, snow-white, spongy crystalline powder, tasteless and inodorous, slightly soluble in water, insoluble in alcohol and ether. By destructive distillation it yields cyanic and hydrocyanic acids, carbon dioxide, and ammonium carbonate. It is readily identified, even in minute quantity, and by dissolving in nitric acid, evaporating the solution to dryness, and adding excess of ammonia, a beautiful deep red colour (murexide) is immediately produced. It forms salts called urates.

ur̄-im, s. pl. [Heb. אורִים (urim), pl. of אור (ur), the same as אור (or) = light.]

Hebrew Antiq.: Literally, lights; but the Septuagint translators make it apparently a plural of excellence, in which case it would signify, light. Used especially in the compound term Urim and Thummin (ΘΥΜΜΙΜ), believed to mean, light and perfection. Many conjectures have been hazarded as to their nature, but the subject still remains very obscure. They were to be put "on the breast-plate of judgment," and on or over the heart of the high priest when he specially entered into the presence of Jehovah (Exod. xxviii. 30; Lev. viii. 8). On the return from the Captivity the Tirshathu (governor) forbade certain sacerdotal pretenders, or perhaps the whole body of Aaron's descendants (for the words seem ambiguous), to eat of the most holy things till they should stand up "a priest with Urim and with Thummin" (Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65). In one place the order of the two words is reversed (Deut. xxxiii. 8). If by Urim in two other passages is meant Urim and Thummin, then they seem to have constituted an oracle to or by which applications might be made to Jehovah for counsel (Numb. xxvii. 21; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6.)

Anat.: A hollow membranous and muscular receptacle receiving the urine poured into it through the ureter, retaining it for a longer or shorter period, and finally expelling it through the urethra. In the male it is situated in front of the rectum; in the female it is separated from the rectum by the uterus and the vagina. When completely distended with urine, it rises above the brim of the pelvis and becomes egg-shaped, the larger end constituting its base, or inferior fundus, and being directed towards the rectum in the male and the vaginæ in the female, and its smaller end, or summit, resting against the wall of the abdomen. In front of the base is the cervix or neck connecting the bladder below with the urethra.

I. Ord. Lang. & Chem.: The secretion of the kidneys, the chief fluid excretion of man and of the higher animals. (Watts.) Healthy human urine is a transparent light amber-coloured liquid, having a saline taste, a peculiar aromatic odour, an acid reaction, and a density varying from 1.010 to 1.025. Its chief constituents are urea, uric, lactic and hippuric acids, and creatine, together with calcium and magnesium sulphates, chlorides and phosphates, alkaline salts, certain imperfectly known principles, and a colouring substance. The urine contains the liquid portion of useless and noxious residuum left after the assimilation of whatever is useful to the structure. [URÆMIA.]

fāte, fat, fare, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, quāte, cūr, rāle, fūll; tr̄y, S̄yrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

and the saccharins. Aqueous urine, with a diminution in its solid contents, is passed in large quantity by nervous and hysterical persons, especially when they approach old age. Subsequent urine, in some respects the opposite of the first, carries off an unduly large proportion of solid matters, and exists chiefly in decline of the bodily powers, which it tends to accelerate. Lithic urine deposits a pink or purple sand or "gravel," consisting of lithias; its ultimate tendency is to produce lithic calculi. Phosphatic urine contains an excess of phosphatic salts, and deposits a white earthy or chalky powder. Purpuric urine deposits a lateritious sediment. Albuminous urine deposits albumen; sometimes it is an unimportant, but at others a very formidable disease. [ALBUMINURIA.] Saccharine urine is an attendant on diabetes (q.v.).

3. Physiol.: The mechanism by which the urine is secreted is apparently of a double kind: (1) uriniferous tubules, which seem to be actively secreting structures, and (2) the Malpighian capsules, which appear to act rather as a filtering apparatus.

Anthrop.: An expression used by Sir Thomas

Browne as a sub-title to his Hydratophia, and employed to denote: (1) the deposition of human ashes in a cinerary urn after cremation; (2) less commonly, actual interment of a corpse in an urn. Both methods were practised by the ancient Greeks, and afterwards spread westward. The úrōs (úrōs), which resembled in size and shape the large oil-jars of southern Europe, was used as an urn to contain burnt human ashes; and two such jars placed mouth to mouth sometimes served as a rude coffin, and thus arranged they are not unfrequently found in the tombs of the Troad. ūr-sa, s. [Lat. = (1) a she bear, (2) a constellation.]

Astron.: The Bear; the first word in the name of two constellations.

Ursa Major, s.

Astron.: The Great Bear. The most conspicuous of the twenty ancient northern constellations, its seven leading stars attracting notice all the more conspicuously that there is a certain absence of visible heavenly bodies in the adjacent parts of the sky. The Semitic conception of the constellation was that it resembled a Bier with mourners walking behind. [ACTURUS, BENETASCH], and it has sometimes been called specifically Lazarus's Bier, the four stars constituting a four-sided figure being the Bier and the other three, Mary, Martha, and Mary Magdalene, the mourners.

It is much like a plough, and is often called the Plough, the rectangle constituting its body, and the three projecting stars its handle. To other minds it suggests a vehicle, whence it has been called the Car of David, and very commonly in England Charles's Wain, or Waggon. The four stars standing together are the wheels, and the three behind are the shaft. Another name is the Dipper. But astronomers cling to the old classical conception of a bear, of which the four stars, $\alpha, \beta, \gamma, \delta$ Ursa Majoris, are the hind quarter, and the three the tail. The remaining portions of the animal are marked out by sundry small stars of the third and fourth magnitude. The Bear was supposed to require a ward or keeper. [ACTURUS.] The Arabs gave the aeyen conspicuous stars names, some of which are still in use. They are called a Ursa Majoria or Dubhe; β , Merak; γ , Phecda; δ , Megrez; ϵ , Alloth; ζ , Mizar; and η , Alcaid, or Benetnasch. The first two are called Pointers, because a line drawn from β through α , and continued for about five times as far as the distance between them will reach the pole-star. Ursa Major is bounded on the north by Draco and Camelopardalia, on the south by Leo Minor, on the east by Canes Venatici, and on the west by Lynx and Camelopardalia. It is too near the pole ever to set in the latitude of London; in its revolution it turns over, but never disappears. At 11 p.m. in the month of April it is directly overhead; at the same hour in September it is in the north and low down; in July it is in the west; and at Christmas in the east. Of the seven stars six are of the second magnitude, the remaining one (δ) being at present between the third and fourth magnitude. Mizar (ζ) is a double star. Powerful telescopes show that the Great Bear is made up of many thousand other stars.

Ursa Minor, s.

Astron.: The Little Bear; a group of the twenty ancient northern constellations, bounded by Draco, Camelopardalia, Cassiopeia and Perseus. Its contour is marked out by seven stars. The curvature of the tail is in the contrary direction to that of the Great Bear; and at its tip is a star of the second magnitude, a Ursa Minoris, called Polaris, or the Pole Star (q.v.) midway between Cassiopeia and the Great Bear. Next in brightness are β Ursa Minoris, called by the Arabs Kokab, and γ Ursa Minoris. The two are sometimes designated the Guards of the Pole, and the other of the third. The remaining stars are smaller.

ūr-sal, s. [URSUS.]

ūr-sī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. urs(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Claws, five on each foot, large, strong, and curved, non-retractile; tongue smooth; ears small, erect, and rounded; tail short; nose forming a movable truncated snout; cæcum absent. Though ranged with the Carnivora, many of the Ursidae live entirely or partially on vegetable diet, and their teeth are modified accordingly. They are widely distributed, but are entirely absent from the Australian and Ethiopian regions, and only one species, Ursus (or Tremarctos) ornatus, from the Andes of Peru and Chili. Wallace reckons fifteen species, which have been grouped into as many as five genera (Ursus, Thalassarctos, Helarctos, Melursus or Prochilus, and Tremarctos); Mivart (Proc.

over the back close to the tail. They commit great havoc among sheep and poultry, and are a match for an ordinary dog. In confinement they appear to be untamably savage. A resinous body, obtained by treating the leaves of the red berry (Arctostaphylos uva-ursi) with ether in a displacement apparatus, and purifying by crystallization from alcohol. It forms slender, colourless needles, having a silky lustre, tasteless, inodorous, insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 190° to 200°, and solidifies again in the crystalline form on cooling.

ūr-sū-line, a. & s. [Named after St. Ursula, a famous British virgin and martyr, who is said to have suffered at Cologne, with 11,000 companions, in the fourth century. The enormous number of St. Ursula's companions has been since explained as originating in a mistake of the early copyists, who found some such entry as—"Ursula, et xl. M. V.," which (taking M for millia) they read as "Ursula and 11,000 virgins," instead of "Ursula and eleven martyr virgins." (Smith: Christ. Biog., iv. 1071.)]

Church History:

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the congregations described under B.

"In the Mifflans alone there were eighteen Ursuline houses at the death of St. Charles."—Adieu & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 827.

B. As subst. (Pl.): An order of nuns developed from a society founded by St. Angela Merici of Brescia (1470-1540) in 1537, under the invocation of St. Ursula (see etym). The objects of the institution were, nursing the sick, the education of girls, and the sanctification of the lives of the members; and the foundation was confirmed by Pope Paul III. in 1544. Till the beginning of the seventeenth century the vows were simple, but in 1612 a bull was obtained from Pope Paul V., making the congregation a religious order, with strict enclosure and solemn vows, a fourth—that of instructing the young—being added to the usual three. Since that time several distinct congregations have been formed.

ūr-sūs, s. [Lat. = a bear.]

1. Zool.: The type-genus of Ursidae (q.v.), with the range of the family. Dental formula, $I. \frac{3}{1}, C. \frac{1}{1}, P.M. \frac{3}{3}, M. \frac{3}{3}$. Milk teeth comparatively small, and shed at an early age; body heavy; feet broad, and completely plantigrade; the five toes on each foot all well developed, and armed with long, compressed, moderately-curved, non-retractile claws; palms and soles naked; tail very short; ears moderate, erect, rounded, hairy; fur generally long, soft, and shaggy. Prof. Flower groups the species in the following sections:

(1) Thalassarctos. Head comparatively small, molar teeth small and narrow, soles more covered with hair than in the other sections. Ursus maritimus, the Polar or White Bear.

(2) Ursus proper; U. arctos, the Common Brown Bear of Europe and Asia, is regarded by some naturalists as identical with the American Black Bear (U. americanus). The Grizzly Bear of the Western States (U. horribilis or ferox) is one of the largest, and the strongest and fiercest of the family. There are several species in Asia which are perhaps but variations from the Black or Brown Bear.

(3) Helarctos. Head short and broad, molars comparatively broad, tongue long and extensile, fur short and smooth. U. malayanus, the Malay or Sun Bear.

2. Palæont.: [BEAR (1), s., I. 1. (2).]

ūr-tī-ca, s. [Lat. = a nettle, a stinging nettle; uro = to burn.]

Bot.: Nettle; the typical genus of Urticaceæ (q.v.). Herbs, rarely shrubs, with stinging hairs and a tenacious inner bark. Leaves opposite, with stinging hairs; calyx four-partite; males with four stamens and the rudiments of an ovary; females with a subsessile, pencillate stigma; fruit an achene. Known species thirty-seven, from temperate and tropical climes. Some species sting strongly. Urtica urentissima, called in Timor the Daoua Setan (the Devil's Leaf) is said by the natives to produce effects continuing about a year, or even to cause death. U. (= Laportea) crenulata, an Indian species, is also formidable. [LAPORTEA.] U. stimulans of Java is less violent. The fibres of U. tenacissima, called in Sumatra, Caloose, can be manufactured into very tough cordage; those of U. cannabina may be similarly employed. The tubers of U. tuberosa are eaten raw, boiled, or roasted by the natives of India. U. simensis, the Sama of Abyssinia, though acrid, is eaten in that country. The leaves and the seeds of U. membranacea, an Egyptian plant, are considered emmenagogue and aphrodisiac. Flogging with nettles was formerly practiced for arthritis and paralysis. The old U. heterophylla, the Nigherry Nettle, is now Girardinia heterophylla. [GIRARDINIA.] Australia produces a tree nettle (U. gigas) abundant in some parts of New South Wales. Ordinarily it is from 25 to 50 feet high, but sometimes attains the imposing proportions of 120 to 140 feet, with a trunk of great thickness, and very large green leaves, which sting violently when young. Of American species may be named U. canadense, whose fibre is used in rope making. The roots of some species of nettles, boiled with alum, yield a yellow dye, and a green dye has been obtained from the juice of the stalks and leaves.

The Mosaic Law prohibited taking interest from Hebrews (Exod. xxii. 25; Levit. xxv. 35-37; Deut. xxiii. 20); and Christ's words, "Give to him that asketh thee," (Matt. v. 42) seem to be of still wider application. The Fathers regarded interest as usury, and therefore as a species of robbery; and this opinion prevailed in the Church till the sixteenth century, and numbered Luther and Melancthon among its defenders. Calvio appears to have been the first theologian who pronounced the modern distinction between interest and usury.

ū-tēr-ūs, s. [Lat.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The womb.

II. Technically:

1. Anatomy:

(1) Compar.: A dilatation in the walls of the oviduct for the preservation or development of the ova. In Birds, although the ova are developed externally, the term uterus is often applied to that cavity where the eggs receive the shell. In most of the Viviparous Fishes, and in the Viviparous Lacertilia and Ophidia the ova develop within the uterine cavity without any assistance or nourishment from the mother. In the Prototheria (= Ornithodelphia = Monotremata) the oviducts, according to some authorities, have no distinct uterine or Fallopian portion, but open directly into a cloacal chamber. Gegenbaur, however, calls the lower end of each oviduct a uterus. In the Metatheria (= Didelphia = Marsupialia) each of the oviducts is differentiated into uterine and Fallopian tracts, opening into a long and distinct vagina. In the Eutheria (= Monodelphia, including all other Mammals) the uterus is variously modified. In the Primates it is normally single, though instances of a double uterus occasionally occur; it is two-horned in the Ruminantia, Pachydermata, Equidae, and Cetacea, and is said to be divided when it has only a very short body, which speedily divides externally and internally, and is continuous with the oviducts (as in most of the Carnivora and Edentata, and some of the Rodentia); it is actually double in some of the Edentata and in most of the Rodentia, including the mouse and the hare, each oviduct passing into an intestineform uterus, which has two completely distinct openings lying near to each other within the vagina.

(2) Human: A hollow, muscular organ, with very thick walls, situated in the pelvic cavity, between the rectum and the bladder. The virgin uterus is about three inches long, two broad, and one inch thick at its upper extremity. The middle part is called the body, the upper the fundus, and the lower, opening into the vagina, the neck. Its chief function is to receive the ovum from the Fallopian tubes, and to retain and support it during the development of the fetus, which it expels by muscular contractions at parturition. During uterogestation the uterus becomes greatly enlarged and undergoes important structural changes.

2. Pathol.: The uterus is liable to many affectional and diseases, as tumours, ulceration, catarrh, tenesmus, hæmorrhage, &c.

Compar. Anat.: The prostatic vesicle. It varies considerably in size: in man it is small, in the rabbit it is of considerable extent. It is developed from the same portion of the embryo as the female uterus. [UTERUS, II.]

ūt-gard, s. [See: out yard.]

Scand. Mythol.: The uttermost borders of the habitable world, where antiquity fixed the abode of giants and monsters; hell. (Grimm: Deut. Mythol., ed. Stallybrass, i. 245.)

*ū-tīle, a. [Fr., from Lat. utilis, from utor = to use.] Useful, profitable, beneficial. (Levinus.)

ū-tīl-ī-tār-ī-an, a. & s. [Eng. utili(y); -arian.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to utility.

2. Pertaining or relating to militarism.

"The author of this essay has reason for believing himself to be the first person who brought the word utilitarian into use. He did not invent it, but adopted it from a passing expression in Mr. Galt's Annals of the Parish. After using it as a designation for several years, he and others abandoned it from a growing dislike to anything resembling a badge or watchword of sectarian distinction. But, as a name for one single opinion, not a set of opinions—to denote the recognition of utility as a standard, not any particular way of applying it—the term supplies a venient mode of avoiding tiresome circumlocution."—J. S. Mill: Utilitarianism, ch. II. (Note.)

B. As subst.: One who upholds the doctrine of utilitarianism.

"Although Utilitarians hold that good and evil, right and wrong are properly determined by a calculation of the consequences as regards human happiness, they do not all maintain that past or existing systems of morals have been on all points founded on this principle."—Chambers's Encyc. (ed. 1867), ix. 684.

utilitarianism—utter

Ethics: A word coined by J. Stuart Mill to denote that system which makes the happiness of mankind the criterion of right. It is thus more extensive than Epicureanism, which constituted personal happiness a criterion for the individual, leaving the happiness of others out of the question. The system owes its origin to Bentham (1748-1832), was attacked by Macaulay in the Edinburgh Review, and is thus defined by J. S. Mill: "The creed which accepts, as the foundation of morals, Utility, or the Greatest Happiness Principle, holds that actions are right in proportion as they tend to promote happiness, wrong as they tend to produce the reverse of happiness. By happiness is intended pleasure, and the absence of pain; by unhappiness, pain, and the privation of pleasure. To give a clear view of the moral standard set up by the theory much more requires to be said; in particular what things it includes in the ideas of pain or pleasure; and to what extent this is left an open question. But these supplementary explanations do not affect the theory of life on which this theory of morality is grounded—namely, that pleasure and freedom from pain are the only things desirable as ends; and that all desirable things (which are as numerous in the utilitarian as in any other scheme) are desirable either for the pleasure inherent in themselves, or as means to the promotion of pleasure and the prevention of pain."

Another derivation is from Gr. eu (eu) = well (in comp. = happy, fortunate, blessed), and topos (topos) = place, when Utopia would = a happy place, a land of perfection. Known species 120 (Sir J. Hooker), widely diffused. The Common Bladderwort (Utricularia vulgaris) is a rootless, floating plant, which in summer becomes conspicuous from its handsome, gold-hued flowers raised in stalks six inches above the water. Its floating bladders are modified leaf-organs which form simple but effective insect traps. They form hollow vesicles, entered by a door or trap which opens inwards only. Minute crustaceans, perhaps attracted by the slight mucilage within, push through this valve, and are entrapped, escape being impossible. This plant, therefore, belongs to the class of Insectivorous Plants.

V.

V, the twenty-second letter, and the fifteenth consonant of the English alphabet, represents a labial or labio-dental consonant sound, and is produced by the junction of the lower lip and upper teeth, as in ov, ev, vain. The sound of v differs from that of f, which is produced in the same way, in being voiced, while that of f is breathed. Both v and f are also continuous consonants, and also belong to the class of the spirants. V in Middle English is commonly written u in MSS., and conversely u sometimes appears as v, most frequently at the beginning of words, and especially in the words vs, vsz, vp, vnto, vnder, and vn-, used as a prefix. As noted under U, u and v were formerly the same letter, and in dictionaries and alphabetical lists words beginning with U and V were, up till a comparatively recent date, combined. [U.] The Latin v, or rather consonant u, was probably pronounced as u: as in vespa = wasp. A very large proportion of the words which begin with v are of French or Latin origin, only vane, vat, vineyard, vizen being English. The letter v did not exist in Anglo-Saxon, its sound being represented by f, as in heofon = heaven, of = (of), [F.] By this may be explained the change of consonant in the plurals of such words as thief, pl. thives, wolf, pl. wolves, &c. V frequently replaces f, as in vat = Mid. Eng. fat; vetches = Mid. Eng. fetches (at the present day so pronounced in the Midland counties), &c. In the dialects of the South of England v is still commonly used when other dialects had f: as vo = foe, vinger = finger, &c. V in some Romance words represents ph, as vial = phial Mid. Eng. visnomy = physiognomy, &c. V has been changed to (1) u in perivinkle = Fr. pervenche, Lat. perivinea; (2) to n in malaisey = Mid. Eng. malvesie, O. Fr. malvoiste. In vulgar speech, especially of Londoners, v is sometimes used for w, and conversely, w for v: as, vell for well, very for very. V never appears as a final letter in English (though a final v sound often occurs), nor is it ever doubled.

V as a symbol is used:

1. As a numeral: For 5, and with a dash over it (V̄) for 5,000

2. In Chem.: For the element Vanadium.

3. In Her.: For vert, in the tricking of arms with a pen and ink. [TRICK, v. 3.]

4. In Law, &c.: For versus (Lat. = against): as, John Doe v. Richard Roe.

6. In Music: As an abbreviation of violino, violin, voce, volta, &c.

vacca = a cow.] To inoculate with the cow-pox by means of vaccine matter or lymph, taken directly or indirectly from the cow, for the purpose of procuring immunity from small-pox, or of mitigating its attack.

vâc-cîn'-a-tion, s. [Eng. vaccinat(e); -ion; Fr. vaccination.]

1. Pathol.: The act or art of vaccinating; the introduction of vaccine matter into the human frame with the view of protecting it against small-pox, or rendering that disease less formidable. It was at first supposed that the cow-pox (q.v.) had arisen by the transmission to the cow of a disease in the horse called "grease," the purulent matter of which was largely employed by Jenner and others for vaccinating purposes, at first after it had been passed through the cow, and afterwards by direct transmission. Its employment has long since been abandoned. The cow-pox is not produced in the human frame by effluvia; actual inoculation is required. When vaccine lymph is introduced into the arm of an infant, by one or more punctures of a lancet, no noticeable effect is discernible for two days. Then a slight papula arises, which, on the fifth or sixth day, becomes of a bluish colour and vesicular, with a raised head and a central cup. On the eighth day it reaches full development, and an inflammatory areola appears, which spreads with the extension of the vesicle for two more days. Then a crust or scale is produced in the centre of the vesicle, and gradually extends until it covers it in every part. On the fourteenth or fifteenth day the scale becomes hard and brown; it next contracts, dries, and blackens, until, between the twentieth and the twenty-fifth day, it falls off, leaving a permanent circular, depressed, and foveated cicatrix. Unless it possess all these characters, and specially unless foveation be present, vaccination is imperfect, and cannot be relied on as a prophylactic against small-pox. It has been established also that four, or at least two, such cicatrices are essential for protection, and that the operation should be repeated in ten to twelve, or, at most, in fourteen years. [REVACCINATION.] Various objections have been brought forward against vaccination; the only one to which importance is attached by medical men is that a danger exists of introducing syphilis into the frame by the use of infected lymph. Dr. Farr deduced from the statistics of the small-pox epidemic of 1871, that if 100,000 vaccinated persons be exposed to certain risks of contagion, 100 will be attacked, ten of which will die; while if 100,000 unvaccinated people be exposed to the same risks, at least 600 will be attacked, of whom 270 will die. The English Commission of 1873 settled the question in the minds of legislators, as all statistics have since done. The German Vaccination Commission of 1884 came to the following conclusions:

"With rare exceptions, one survived attack of small-pox confers immunity against subsequent attacks. Vaccination exerts a similar protection. The duration of the protection varies within wide limits, but on the average, ten years. At least two well-developed vaccine vesicles are necessary to ensure an efficient protection. Revaccination is necessary ten years after primary vaccination. The vaccinated condition of the community increases the relative protection against small-pox acquired by the individual and hence vaccination is beneficial, not only to individuals, but generally. Vaccination may have an injurious effect under certain circumstances. In the use of human lymph, the danger of transferring syphilis, however slight, cannot be entirely excluded. Any other bad effects are apparently only due to the consequences of the wound, e.g., erysipelæ, &c. All these dangers may by precaution be reduced to such a minimum as to make the benefit of vaccination infinitely outweigh them. Since the introduction of vaccination, no scientifically-proved increase of any particular disease or of the general mortality has occurred, since the dangers to health and life (vaccination-syphilis, &c.) occasionally connected with the use of human lymph can be avoided by the use of animal lymph, and since vaccination with animal lymph has been recently so perfected as almost to equal vaccination with human lymph, the latter is to be gradually superseded by animal lymph."

2. The vaccination process has raised strong opposition, anti-vaccinationists alleging that the process rather tends to increase than to decrease small-pox, and causes a large increase in the number of children afflicted by such inoculable diseases as acrofula, syphilis, skin diseases, &c. To this it is replied that these statements are based on incorrect returns, and that statistics properly and broadly considered tell a very different story. Such danger as exists comes from vaccination with human lymph, and is likely to be completely overcome through the use of pure animal virus. Since 1880 the use of lymph from the calf has very greatly increased. In Berlin the law permits only the use of this lymph, and it is generally employed throughout Germany. The use of lymph from cow pox began in the United States in 1870, and this now has almost superseded human lymph, with very beneficial results. In France the use is general, and it is being adopted in Britain. A calf yields sufficient lymph to inoculate 400 or 500 children. Compulsory vaccination is the law in some countries, as in England, though considerable opposition to it exists there. In the United States it is being required in the public schools of certain cities, pupils being refused admission unless vaccinated. Vaccination is not otherwise compulsory in this country. vác-ù-ùm (pl. vác-ù-ùms or vác-ù-a), s. [Lat. neut. sing. of vacuus = empty, from vaco = to be empty.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A void, a vacuity.

2. Physics: A space which contains no material substance. The general way of obtaining a vacuum is to pump the air out of a closed space by means of an air-pump; but the vacuum which can be obtained by an ordinary air-pump is not very perfect. Much better results are obtained with the mercury-pump, of which there are several forms, in all of which the air is caught by a falling column of mercury, and carried down a long tube out into the surrounding air. Another method of obtaining a vacuum is the chemical method, which consists in filling a space with carbonic acid gas, and afterwards introducing some caustic potash, which absorbs the gas. Such a thing as a perfect vacuum has never been obtained, and probably never will be obtained. Even as practically meant, it is always understood that the vacuum only extends to matter, and that the space is still filled by ether. [TORRICELLIAN.]

vacuum-brake, s.

Rail.: A form of steam-brake, in which the power employed is the pressure of the atmosphere produced by creating a vacuum.

vacuum-gauge, s.

Steam-eng.: An instrument for indicating difference between the external atmospheric pressure and the pressure inside a partially exhausted vessel; such as a steam-boiler which has become cold and in which the steam has condensed; a condenser in which the steam from the cylinder is condensed; the receiver of an air-pump.

vacuum-pan, s.

Sugar-manuf.: A vessel for boiling saccharine juices in vacuo in the process of making sugar. Its form is usually nearly spheroidal, and it is made in two segmental nearly semi-globular portions, united at the equator by exterior flanges. At the top is a dome, into which the vapour rises, and from which it is drawn either by a pump or a condenser. The peculiar feature of the vacuum-pan is that, by the exclusion of the air, the quality and quantity of the crystallizable sugar are increased, a smaller proportion of grape-sugar, or molasses being obtained.

vacuum-pump, s.

Steam-engine:

1. A pump used for withdrawing the air from a boiler or chamber, in order that it may be filled with water forced in under atmospheric pressure. It is employed in connection with marine engines.

2. A pump in which the condensation of steam is made use of to produce a vacuum for the purpose of raising water.

Physics: Tubes blown and twisted into different shapes, and hermetically sealed with two platinum wires or electrodes fused with them for the passage of an electric current or spark. Previously to sealing they are exhausted, with the exception of a very small quantity of air or other gases. Under these circumstances electric discharge causes various phosphorescent glows (according to the gas employed in the tube) which may assume peculiar forms, as of layers or strata. Sometimes phosphorescent glass is employed for the tubes themselves, which is illuminated by the glow in the gas. Called also Gassiot or Geissler tubes, from the inventor and chief investigator. Another distinct class of these tubes is prepared with extremely high vacua, ranging to one ten-millionth of an atmosphere, and with various contained apparatus. In such vacua, the mean free path of the gaseous molecules is vastly increased, and many phenomena occur, which were discovered and mainly investigated by Mr. William Crookes, who considers them to represent a fourth state of matter, as distinct from the ordinary gaseous form as that is from the condition of a fluid.

vacuum-valve, s. A reversed safety-valve, opening inwardly to the pressure of the atmosphere when there is a negative pressure in the boiler.

The founder of the Vaisesika system was Kanáda, whose exact date is unknown, but it may be vaguely conjectured as about 500 B.C. The system assumes or establishes that all material substances are composed of atoms mechanically united. These atoms it regards as eternal in their duration. The combinations of them which form the present world are, however, but transitory; so also is the present system of things. The Vaisesika philosophy is generally connected with the Nyaya or Logical school of Gautama, of which it is supposed to be a modification.

Horace Haymsn Wilson divided the Vaishnavas into the following sections: (1) Rámánujas, Sri Sampradáyas, or Sri Vaishnavas; (2) Rámánandias, or Rámánvats; (3) Kabir Panthis; (4) Khákias; (5) Máhik Dásias; (6) Dádú Panthis; (7) Ráya Dásias; (8) Senátas; (9) Vallabhachárias, or Rndra Sampradáyas; (10) Mírú Báis; (11) Madhwácháris, or Brahma Sampradáyas; (12) Nimávats, or Sanakádi Sampradáyas; (13) the Vaishnavas of Bengal; (14) Radhá Vallabhís; (15) the Sakhi Bhávats; (16) Charan Dásias; (17) Harischandís; (18) Sadhána Panthis; (19) Mádhavís; and (20) Sunnyásias, Vatrágis, and Nágas.

* 1. A sweetheart or choice made on St. Valentine's day.

"To-morrow is St. Valentine's day,
All in the morning betime!
And I will call your window,
To be your Valentine."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 3.

† According to the legend, St. Valentine was beheaded on February 14, at Rome, under Claudius. The old notion was that birds began to couple on that day, and hence arose the custom of young persons of both sexes choosing each other as "valentines" for the ensuing year by a species of lottery, and of sending love missives to each other.

2. A letter or other missive sent by young persons of both sexes to each other on Valentine's day; a printed missive of an amatory or satirical nature, generally sent by post anonymously. Some valentines are highly ornamental and artistic, while others are caricatures, designed to reflect on the personal appearance, habits, character, &c., of the persons to whom they are addressed. The practice of sending valentines appears to be diminishing year by year. Postal returns indicate a great falling off in the numbers of valentines sent during the past decade, one large office showing a decrease from 117,000 to 45,000 within five years. The sending of caricatures has equally decreased, and the veiled insults thus frequently offered have been creditably reduced. The sending of valentines is a harmless folly, which is dying out.

vál-én-tín-i-ang, s. pl. [See def.]

Church Hist.: The followers of Valentinus, an Egyptian gnostic, whose sect arose at Rome, then rooted itself deeply in Cyprus, and finally spread throughout a great part of southern Europe, western Asia, and northern Africa. He supposed that in the Pleroma (q.v.) there were thirty male and as many female æons united in wedlock, with four unmarried, these latter being Horns, Christ, the Holy Spirit, and Jesus. The youngest æon, Sophia (Wisdom), brought forth a daughter, Achromoth, whence sprang the Demiurge, who created mankind. This Demiurge, becoming puffed up with pride, aspired to be regarded as the only god, and led many angels into the same error. To repress his insolence, Christ descended, Jesus, one of the highest æons, joining him when he was baptised in Jordan. The Demiurge had him crucified; but, before his death, both Jesus the Son of God and the rational soul of Christ had separated, leaving only the sentient soul and the ethereal body to suffer. The Valentinians were divided into the Ptolemaic, the Secundian, the Heraclonite, the Marcostian, and many other sects.

Bot.: Valerian; the typical genus of Valerianaceæ or Valerianæ. Herbs, generally perennial, with radical leaves crowded, those of the stem opposite or whorled, entire or pinnatifid; flowers cymose, with bracteoles; corolla five-cleft, gibbous at the base, stamens three; fruit crowned with a feathery pappus. Known species about 130, from the North Temperate Zone and from South America. The Common Valerian (Valeriana officinalis) is abundant in ditches, moist woods, &c., in all parts of Europe and in northern Asia. In the United States it is a cultivated plant. The root is fleshy, the leaves pinnatifid, the stalk two to four feet high, the flowers pale flesh-colored. The root, which is warm and aromatic, is a well-known medicine, particularly so when the plant is grown in dry hilly ground. It yields a volatile oil, in which valerianic acid is developed on exposure to the air. Some of the salts of this acid are specially valuable medicinally. The root is used in pharmacy in spasms, hemiplegia, hysteria, chorea, epilepsy, hypochondriasis, and as an auxiliary to tonics in intermittents. Baths of valerian have been found of much use in acute rheumatism. In excessive doses it produces headache and mental excitement. It is highly attractive to rats, and also to cats, hence it is called Cats' Valerian; and, being much used by the poor as an application to fresh wounds, is named also All-heal. V. Pyrenaica, which has very large, cordate, deeply-toothed leaves, is a native of the Pyrenees. It grows in woods in Scotland, but is not indigenous. The winged seeds have been carried by the wind from adjacent gardens in which it is cultivated. V. celtica and *V.  "A level tract of great extent and traversed by two or more rivers is, properly speaking, not a valley, but a plain; deep, narrow river-courses are more correctly designated as gorges, glens, ravines, &c.

II. Technically:
 1. Anat.: [VALLEOLA].
 2. Arch.: The internal angle formed by the junction of two inclined sides of a roof.
 3. Geol.: A long depression or hollow on the surface of the earth, margined by ground more or less high. It may be on a vast scale of magnitude, as the bed of an ocean would be if upheaved sufficiently to become land, or it may be comparatively small but broad as a Scottish strath; or narrow, as what is called in that country a glen or a deep gorge, called by the Spanish-Americans a cañon. It may be surrounded by hills, or may constitute a depression crossing a country from sea to sea. Valleys of stratification are produced by the decay and removal of shale or other soft rocks, while the less destructible hard rocks remain. Thus the limestones of the Oolite cross England diagonally in parallel lines, while the intervening shales and clays have left valleys in their place. Other valleys have been excavated by rivers alone. Many valleys on low-lying plains adjacent to the sea have originally constituted river-beds and banks, then through a depression of the land the ocean has gained access to them, constituting them estuaries; then again upheaval has made them land-valleys. Other valleys have constituted the beds of old lakes. Valleys, resembling troughs, on table-lands are in many cases produced by the flexure of strata laterally, so as to constitute a series of elevations and depressions. A small number of valleys occurring high up mountain-sides may constitute old craters of eruption.

1. Music: The relative length or duration of a tone or note; as, A semibreve is of the value of two minims, or four crotchets, or eight quavers, &c.

2. Polit. Econ.: The value of any economic quantity is any other economic quantity for which it can be exchanged. (McLeod.) Worth as estimated by the power of purchasing or being exchanged for other commodities;

the command which the possession of a thing gives over purchasable commodities in general. Value differs from price, in that the latter always expresses the value of a thing in relation to money.

† Intrinsic Value, Standard of Value: Jevons, Macleod, Walker, Kitson, and other contemporary economists hold that, strictly speaking, value is the relation or ratio in exchange that one thing bears to other things, and, therefore, that it cannot be inherent, or reside in any one thing. The idea of value never arises until one object is confronted with another; hence, while a single object may be said to possess purchasing power, it cannot alone possess value. Jevons asserts that value is the "accident of a thing, arising from the fact that someone wants it," from which he argues that intrinsic value is absurd—"a nonentity." In this view, a standard of value is also absurd, since "standard of accident" or "standard of ratio" are terms quite as ridiculous as "intrinsic accident" or "intrinsic ratio." Again, ratios may be numerically expressed, but cannot be measured. This reduces the scientific definition of value to: A numerical expression of ratios of exchangeability; which renders a material standard of value not only absurd but actually impossible. In common use, however, by intrinsic value is really meant the price which an object will command in current money, and the term standard of value refers to a system which seeks to make a money of account conform to the purchasing power of a certain commodity. Both of these uses are manifestly incorrect and misleading, from the standpoint of the eminent economists named above.

vám-píre, s. & a. [Fr. from Ger. vampyr, from Serv. vampir, vampira; Pol. upiór; Russ. upír = a vampire.]

A. As substantive:

I. Literally:

1. A kind of nocturnal demon, supposed to eat out the hearts and souls, or suck the blood of its victims. This superstition had its rise in the desire of savage animism to account for the fact that certain patients are seen becoming, day by day, without any apparent cause, thin, weak, and bloodless, and is found among the Karens, in Polynesia, and in the Malay Peninsula. But it is in Slavonia and Hungary that these demon bloodsuckers have their special home, and it is from these countries that their name of "vampire" is derived. According to Tylor, there are two theories of vampirism. The first is, that the soul of a living man, usually a sorcerer, leaves its own body and goes forth, in the visible shape of a straw or a piece of fluff, and attacks its sleeping victim. Should the sleeper awake and clutch the embodied soul, he may through it have his revenge by maltreating or destroying its bodily owner. The second theory is that the soul of a dead man goes out from its buried corpse to suck the blood of living men. The corpse, thus supplied by its returning soul with blood, is believed to remain unnaturally fresh, supple, and ruddy; and, accordingly, the means of detecting a vampire is to open the grave, when the reanimated corpse will be found to bleed when cut, and even to move and shriek. One way to lay a vampire is to stake down the corpse (as with suicides, and with the same intention); but the more effectual plan is to behead and burn it. (Prim. Cult., ed. 1873, ch. xv.)

"Vampires are not mere creations of groundless fancy, but causes conceived in spiritual form to account for specific facts of wasting disease."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), II. 122.

2. The same as VAMPIRE-BAT (q. v.).

II. Fig.: One who preys on others; an extortioner or bloodsucker.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a vampire; resembling a vampire in character; hence, fig., blood-sucking, extortionate.

"There is a whole literature of hideous vampire stories, which the reader will find elaborately discussed in Cabinet."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), II. 192.

Zoology:

* 1. A name formerly given to Vampyrus spectrum.

"The vampire-bat is a native of Southern America, and is spread over a large extent of country. It is not a very large animal, the length of its body and tail being only six inches, or perhaps seven in very large specimens, and the spread of wing two feet or rather more. The colour of the vampire's fur is a mouse tint, with a shade of brown."—Hood: Illus. Nat. Hist., I. 114.

2. Any species of the group Desmodontes, consisting of two genera, each represented by a single species. They differ from all other bats in the character of dentition, the upper incisors being very large, trenchant, and occupying the whole space between the canines; premolars very narrow, with sharp-edged longitudinal crowns; molars rudimentary or none; oesophagus very narrow; cardiac extremity of stomach greatly elongated, forming a long, narrow cæcum. (Proc. Zool. Soc., 1865, p. 388.) The species are sanguivorous, and cling by their extremities to the body of the animal whose blood they may be sucking.

"The Vampire Bat is often the cause of much trouble by biting the horses on their withers. The injury is generally not so much owing to the loss of

We were hitchacking late one evening near Coquimbo, in Chili, when my servant, noticing that one of the horses was very restive, went to see what was the matter, and, fancying he could detect something, suddenly put his hand on the beast's withers, and secured the Vampire.—Darwin: Naturalist's Voyage (ed. 1838), p. 22.

Muzzle long and narrow in front; distance between the eyes generally less than distance from the eye to extremity of muzzle; nose-leaf well developed, horse-shoe-shaped in front, lanceolate behind; inter-femoral membrane well-developed; tail generally distinct. Nearly all the species appear to be insectivorous, so that the name applied to this group cannot be considered indicative of their habits. va-ná-dí-úm, s. [Latinised from Vanadis, a name of the Scandinavian goddess Freyja, from the fact of its discovery in Swedish iron.]

Chem.: A metallic pentad element, discovered by Selström in 1830, in the refinery slag of the iron ore of Teberg, in Sweden; symb. V; at. wt., 51.2. It is extracted from the fluely-pulverised slag by deflagrating with nitre and sodic carbonate, digesting the fused mass with a saturated solution of sal-ammoniac, and igniting the product in an open vessel. On heating the mass with potassium, and washing with water, pure vanadium is obtained as a brilliant metallic powder, having a silver-white lustre. It is non-volatile, does not tarnish in the air, burns vividly when heated in oxygen, is insoluble in hydrochloric acid, dissolves slowly in hydrofluoric acid, but very rapidly in nitric acid, forming a blue solution. It forms five oxides analogous to the oxides of nitrogen, and three chlorides, viz., the dichloride, the trichloride, and the tetrachloride.

Chem.: Vanadium forms four oxides: (1) Vanadium dioxide, V_2O_2 , is obtained by reducing either of the higher oxides with potassium. It forms a light gray glittering powder, having a sp. gr. of 3.64, and is insoluble in sulphuric and hydrochloric acids. (2) Vanadium trioxide, V_2O_3 , is obtained by igniting the pentoxide in hydrogen gas. It is a black powder, with an almost metallic lustre, and is insoluble in acids. (3) Vanadium tetroxide, V_2O_4 , is obtained by allowing the trioxide to absorb oxygen at ordinary temperatures, forming blue shining crystals. It is soluble in acids, and combines with bases forming vanadates, none of which is of any importance. (4) Vanadium pentoxide, V_2O_5 , is prepared by igniting vanadate of ammonium in an open platinum crucible. It has a more or less reddish yellow colour, is tasteless, and dissolves in the stronger acids, forming red or yellow solutions.

Flowers in racemes, beautifully coloured—blue, red, yellow, brown, &c.—and highly fragrant. They occur in India, China, the Moluccas, &c., as parasites upon trees in dense forests, from which they have been introduced into hot-houses in Great Britain and elsewhere. They may be attached to a piece of wood or a wire-basket, as their nourishment is derived from the atmosphere and not from the soil. More than twenty species are known. II. Physics: An aeriform fluid into which some volatile substance is changed by the action of heat. Vapor is essentially the same as gas, but the word vapor is conventionally limited to the gaseous state of a body which is liquid or solid at ordinary temperature, while the term gas is applied to aeriform bodies which are in that rarefied state at ordinary temperature. Thus we speak of hydrogen gas, but of watery vapors. Vapors, like gases, have a certain elastic force, by which they exert a pressure on every part of any vessel in which they are enclosed. Vapors are formed instantly in a vacuum; in the atmosphere they are generated more slowly. When not saturated they exactly resemble gases in their action; when saturated and in contact with the liquid by which they were generated, they can neither be compressed nor expanded, but remain constant, both in their elastic force and in their density. Vapors of different composition vary in density. Thus if atmospheric air be taken as unity, the vapor of water = 0.6235, that of alcohol 1.6138, that of sulphur 6.6542, and that of mercury 6.9760.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: Any deviation from the mean orbit or mean motion of a heavenly body produced by the perturbation of another body or bodies. Thus the planets are considered to move mathematically in elliptic orbits, which would be the case if they were subject to the attraction of the sun only, but being acted on by each other, there is supposed to be a minute and slow but constant variation in the elements of the ellipse. Variations which are compensated in short intervals are called periodic, and those which require for their compensation a long period are called secular. (Herschel: Astron., § 653-655.)

2. Biology:

† (4) An organism, or a group of organisms, exhibiting modification due to external conditions.

"The rules of grammar, and useful examples of the variation of words, and the peculiar forms of speech, are often appointed to be repeated."—Watts: On the Mind.

1. Musical: An air or theme with variations is a musical composition in which a simple melody is first given out, and then several times repeated, each repetition containing changes by means of broken harmony, counterpoint, broken rhythm, the arpeggio, scale-passages, and even by modification of key. The earliest forms of a variation were the "divisions" ad led to a ground-bass; they there followed the changes above described, but the character of variations in modern music has gradually developed into a series of sound-pictures, of which the theme is indeed the main subject, but is represented under various phases of sentiment, expression, thought, and æsthetic colouring.

5. Physics & Navig.: The angle included between the true and magnetic meridians of any particular place. If the direction of the true meridian at any given place were known, the variation of the needle would be found by simply taking the bearing of this line with the compass. If the bearing of the meridian is east of north, the variation is to the west; if the bearing is west of north, the variation is to the east. In order, therefore, to find the variation of the needle at any place, we first find the direction of the true meridian, or of some line which makes a known angle with it; we then observe the bearing of this line; from this result the variation is easily computed. The line most usually employed is the line of greatest elongation of the pole star, either to the east or west. At London, in 1550, the deviation was $11^{\circ} 17'$ E.; about 1669 it was 0° . It then began to deviate to the west, till it attained its maximum in 1815, $24^{\circ} 17' 18''$. In 1865 it was $20^{\circ} 38'$.

(4) Variation of the compass: [MAGNETISM, ¶; VARIATION, II. 5.].

(5) Variation of the moon:

Astron.: Irregularity in the moon's motion and in the form of her orbit, depending on the angular distance of the luminary from the sun. When nearest the earth the true longitude, as seen from the earth, is gaining on the mean longitude; it will be the reverse when she is in quadratures (farthest from the earth), and at intermediate points-nearly coinciding with octants, she will be neither gaining nor losing. But at these points the amount of gain or loss will have reached its maximum. The entire variation produced by this cause in the moon's longitude, is $1^{\circ} 4'$. (Herschel: Astron., § 795.)

(6) Variations of the barometer: [BAROMETEER].

In general, the disease almost simultaneously affects all the leaves of a branch. var-nish, *var-nisch, *ver-nysshe, *ver-nysshe, s. [Fr. vernis = varnish; vernisier = to varnish; O. Fr. vernis (pa. par. vernit) = to varnish; vernis = varnished, from a supposed Low Lat. vitrinus = to glaze, from Lat. vitrinus = pertaining to or resembling glass, from vitrum = glass; Sp. barniz, barnis = varnish, lacquer; barnizar = to varnish, to lacquer; Ital. vernice = varnish; verniciare, verniciatore = to varnish; cf. Late Gr. βερνικιον, βερνικη (beronikē, bernikē) = amber.]

1. Lit.: A thin, resinous fluid, which when spread over the surface of wood, metal, glass, or other solid substance, forms a shining coating, impervious to air and moisture. Varnishes are prepared by dissolving certain resins, as copal, aniline, mastic, lac, &c., in spirit of wine, or in fixed or volatile oils, thus producing spirit varnishes or oil varnishes. Amber is hard, tough, and soluble with difficulty; it makes an excellent varnish, but is expensive and dries slowly. Copal is next in durability to amber, and is more largely used than any other gum in preparing oil varnishes. Aniline dries quickly, but is deficient in toughness, and is liable to crack. Crystal varnish for maps or drawings is prepared by dissolving Canada balsam in the purest oil of turpentine. Common resin, dissolved by means of heat in lioseed-oil or turpentine, is used as a varnish for some common purposes, and is mixed with other varnishes to impart brilliancy, but unless sparingly used renders them liable to crack. [See DAMMARIN, LAC-VARNISH, MASTIC.]

They are chiefly natives of the hotter parts of the Eastern hemisphere, and the Varnish-tree of each country or large province is, as a rule, different from that of others. In Tenasserim, Pegu, &c., the varnish-tree is Melanorrhiza ussatisima, sometimes specifically called the Black, or Martaban varnish; that of Japan is Rhus vernicifera and Stagnaria verniciflora; that of Sylhet, Semeecarpus Anacardium. The varnish-trees of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean is Rhus Coriaria. It is a tree the leaves of which are divided into five to seven pairs of hairy leaflets with a terminal one. It is fifteen to twenty feet high.

It chiefly consists of ducts and pitted or woody tissue collected into compact, wedge-shaped, vertical plates, the edges of which rest on the pith and the bark, while the sides are in contact with the medullary rays. It comprises the medullary sheath, which consists of spiral vessels and woody tissue intermixed. In an endogenous stem, the vascular system exists in the form of fibrous bundles, consisting of woody tissue containing spiral or other vessels, the whole embedded in the cellular system.

vase (or as vásce), s. [Fr., from Lat. vasum, vas = a vase, a vessel.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A vessel of various forms and materials, applied to the purposes of domestic life, sacrificial uses, &c. They were often used merely for ornament, or were at least primarily ornamental in character and design. The antique vases found in great numbers in ancient tombs and catacombs in Etruria, Southern Italy, Greece, Sicily, &c., and used to contain the ashes of the dead, were for the most part made of baked clay, painted and glazed, though by the Egyptians, Greeks, and Ottomans other materials, such as precious stones, gold, silver, bronze, ivory, and glass, were used. One form of vase seems to have been peculiar to Etruria—viz, black or red vessels, with figures in relief upon them. A favourite kind of vase, introduced into Rome by Pompey, was called Murhine (q.v.). Another kind was the cameo vase, made of two layers of glass, the outer of which was opaque, and was cut down so as to leave fáte, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fáll, fáther; wé, wét, hère, camél, hér, thére; pine, pít, síre, sír, maríne; gó, pót, or, wóre, wólf, wórk, whó, són; múte, óub, óüre, únite, cùr, rúle, fúll; trý, Síryan. æ, œ = é; ey = á; qu = kw.

figures standing out upon the lower layer as a ground. (To this class belongs the celebrated Portland Vase in the British Museum. The glass vases of Venice became famous in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and in the same and following centuries many vases of the highest artistic performances were produced in Italy, France, and Germany. The porcelain vases of China and Japan are also characterized by great elegance of form and beauty of ornamentation.

Chem.: Petroleum jelly. A pale yellow, translucent, semi-solid substance, consisting of a mixture of the hydrocarbons C₁₆H₃₄ and C₂₀H₄₂, obtained by treating the undistilled product of petroleum with superheated steam, and filtering while hot through animal charcoal. It is insoluble in water, very slightly soluble in alcohol, but dissolves freely in ether, chloroform, benzene, and turpentine, is miscible in all proportions with fixed and volatile oils, melts at 35° to 40°, and commences to fume at 160°. Its density in the melted state is .840 to .865. It is also said to possess curative powers of its own.

The first constitution was unanimously accepted in a session of 667 prelates, and confirmed by the Pope (Pius IX.) on April 20, 1870. The second constitution led to a long discussion; on May 13 the scheme, with the added clauses on Papal Infallibility, was laid before the Council, and on July 12 the bull Pastor Aeternus, containing the constitution and the definition of Papal Infallibility was read. 535 prelates voted in favour of it, two voted against it, whilst several absented themselves from the public session. Hindoo Sacred Lit.: The oldest Hindoo sacred volume, or series of volumes, divided into four portions: the Rig-veda, the Sama-veda, the Yajur-veda, and the Atharva-veda, often spoken of as separate Vedas. The oldest is the Rig-veda; then the Sama-veda and the Yajur-veda were composed, and after an interval the Atharva-veda was added. They are in metre, consisting of hymns supposed to have been divinely revealed to certain Rishis or Brahmanical sages. The hymns of the Rig-veda are arranged in ten circles according to the families of their composers. Some are named after their individual authors. The Sama, Yajur, and Atharva Vedas consist of extracts from the Rig-vedic hymns made to be used in connection with sacrificial offerings. They are therefore in the mass more modern than the Rig-veda, though individual portions of the Sama-veda have more archaic grammatical forms than those of the Rig-veda, and may be older. The Atharva, on the contrary, is so much more modern, that it did not obtain its present place without controversy. To the Samhita, or collection of hymns, in each Veda was appended a Brahmana, or prose commentary or theological treatise. With these were connected certain upanishads, speculative treatises. [UPANISHAD.] Then follow sutras (strings), consisting of short sentences strung together; but these, though founded on the Vedas, are admitted by the Brahmans to have been only of human origin. The Vedas were composed while their Aryan authors were fighting their way forward from the north-western boundary of India across the five rivers of the Punjab onward to the Ganges. [For the theology see BRAHMANISM and RIG-VEDA.]

Their language differs but little from the common Singhalese.

Vē-dān-ga, s. [Sansk. See def.]

Hindoo Sacred Lit. (Pl.): What the Brahmans call "members of the Veda." They are six in number, but this name, says Max Müller (Ancient Sanscrit Literature, p. 109), "does not imply the existence of six books or treatises intimately connected with their sacred writings, but merely the admission of six authors, for the study of which was necessary either for the reading, the understanding, or the proper sacrificial employment of the Veda." The six subjects or doctrines usually comprehended under the name Vedangas are:

Sikshā (= pronunciation), Chhandas (= metre), Vyākaraṇa (= grammar), Nirukta (= explanation of words), Jyotisha (= astronomy), and Kalpa (= ceremonial). The first two are considered necessary for reading the Veda, the two next for understanding it, and the last two for employing at sacrifices. The writers of the Vedangas do not claim inspiration.

Vē-dān-ta, s. [Sansk. = conclusion of the Veda.]

Hindoo Philos.: A system of religion and philosophy professedly founded on the Vedas. It is divided into the Pūrva mīmāṃsā and the Uttara mīmāṃsā, or the former and latter mīmāṃsās, which constitute two of the leading darsanas or schools of philosophy. As the first of these is chiefly practical, the Vedānta philosophy is mainly derived from the second. It was founded by Vyāsa, and was modified by Sankara, its commentator. The former identified the world with God, and contended earnestly for the reality of the external universe, which he held to have been created by God; the later Vedāntist maintained that the universe is but an illusion projected by God, and is itself God. The present Vedānta system is Pantheistic. It has many adherents among the more educated Hindoos. (Banerjee: On the Hindoo Philosophy, &c.) vegetable-kingdom, s.

Bot.: The English equivalent of the Latin term Regnum Vegetabile, used by Linnaeus to designate and comprehend all plants of whatever affinity, from the highest to the lowest. In his Systema Naturae he divided it into three tribes: Monocotyledones, Dicotyledones, and Acotyledones; but he made no subsequent use of this arrangement either in his Artificial or in his Natural System of classification. For Lindley's classification, see BOTANY.

vegetable-leather, s.
Bot.: Euphorbia punicea.

vegetable-life, s. The life of a plant as distinguished from that of an animal. Linnaeus described a vegetable as an organized being possessed of life but not of feeling. Like an animal, it has the powers of nutrition or self-support, that of assimilating to itself particles of other bodies suitable for its nourishment and growth, and finally it has the power of reproduction. [PLANT, II., 1.]

vegetable-marrow, s. [MARROW (1), s., ¶ 2.]

vegetable-morphology, s. [MORPHOLOGY.]

vegetable-mould or soil, s. Mould or soil to a certain extent formed by decaying or decayed vegetation. It might be supposed that this would tend to increase continually in thickness, especially in tropical forests, where vegetation is so luxuriant; but a large proportion of it is swept away by the heavy rains, or, decomposing on the spot, is partly resolved into gaseous elements.

vegetable-oils, s. pl. [OIL, I., 2.]

Bot.: The branch of pathology or of botany which treats of the diseases of plants.

vegetable-physiology, s.
Bot.: The physiology of plants, the branch of physiology or of botany which treats of the functions which the several organs of plants perform.

vegetable-sheep, s.
Bot.: Baccharis erimbia, a New Zealand plant. So called because from its growing in large, white tufts on elevated sheep-runs it is liable to be mistaken for the sheep itself. It is a composite flower—one of the Helichryseae.

vegetable-silk, s.
Bot., etc.: A cotton-like fibre obtained from the seed pods of a tree, Charisia speciosa, used by the Brazilians for stuffing pillows and cushions. It is a Sterculiad, akin to the Silk Cotton-tree, 1. & 2. (q.v.).

vēg-ēt-ār-i-an, s. & a. [Eng. vegetable; -arian.]

A. As substantive:

1. One who abstains from animal food, living exclusively on vegetables, milk, eggs, and the like. The more strict vegetarians eat vegetables and farinaceous food only, abstaining from eggs, butter, and milk.

2. One who maintains the doctrine of vegetarianism.

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to vegetarians or vegetarianism; of or belonging to the diet or system of vegetarians.

Vegetarian Society, s. A society consisting of members, associates, and subscribers, formed at Manchester in 1847, to promote the use of cereals, pulse, and fruit, as articles of diet; and to induce habits of abstinence from fish, flesh, and fowl, as food. The Vegetarian Federal Union was formed in the United States, Germany, Australia, and Great Britain. International Congresses of vegetarians have been held.

vēg-ēt-ār-i-an-ism, s. [Eng. vegetarian; -ism.] The practice of living solely on the products of the vegetable kingdom—grain, pulse, fruit, and nuts, with or without the addition of eggs and milk and its products (butter and cheese), to the exclusion of flesh, fish, and fowl.

Vegetarians allege in support of this system that man when created was exclusively frugivorous, and that his structure is not adapted for a flesh diet; that the adoption of the vegetarian method of living would enable the country to support a greater population, and render it independent of a foreign food supply; that vegetarianism is favourable to temperance, a peaceful disposition, and purity in thought and life; that it is preferred by children; that it is infinitely cheaper than a flesh diet; that its adoption would enable the working classes not only to live better, but to save money; that it would stay the revolting horrors of the slaughter-house; that much better health is invariably enjoyed by vegetarians, who are also less liable to give way to intemperance. On the other hand, the most eminent physiologists, while admitting that a theoretically perfect diet can be obtained from the vegetable kingdom, hold that a mixed diet is the best, and the structure of man's organs (especially of the stomach and teeth) is held to prove an adaptation for all kinds of food. Apart from the story of Genesis, which many authorities hold to be poetical rather than literal, there are no means of ascertaining the diet of the first man, but practically all the remains that have been discovered show that at a very early stage in his existence man was a hunter, and lived almost exclusively on a flesh diet.

Vēg-ēt-ār-i-ans, s. pl. A Chinese sect who observe the habit of vegetarianism as a religious duty. This sect was charged with inciting the murder of many Christian missionaries in 1895.

vĕhm-gĕ-richt-ĕ (v as f, ch guttural), s. [Pl. of Ger. vehmericht, from O. Ger. vehm, vehm, vehm = punishment, and gericht = a court of justice.]

Hist.: A system of secret tribunals which originated during the Middle Ages in Westphalia, and then spread over Germany, where the regular administration of justice had fallen into complete disorder. The supreme government of the Vehmnic tribunals was vested in the Great or General Chapter, composed of the Freegraves and all the other initiated members, high and low. The assemblies of the tribunals were generally held in broad daylight and in public, sometimes by night and in secret. The last tribunal was held at Zell in 1568, but a few Vehmnic tribunals existed in name, though without possessing any remnant of their pristine power, as late as the middle of the eighteenth century. Westphalia was divided into districts, each of which usually contained one, and sometimes many, Vehmnic tribunals, whose boundaries were accurately defined. The court itself was composed of "Echevins," nominated by the Lord or Graf, and divided into two classes—(1) the ordinary, and (2) the Wissender, or Witán—who were admitted under a strict bond of secrecy. The criminal jurisdiction of the Vehmnic tribunals took the very widest range. They, like the Echevins, were of two classes—(1) the open court, or Folkmoot, and (2) the far-famed and dreaded Secret Tribunal. Charlemagne, according to the tradition, was the founder of the Vehmnic tribunal, but this is not confirmed either by documentary evidence or by contemporary history. More probably these tribunals were the original summary jurisdictions of the old Saxons, which survived the subjugation of their country. In fact, these proceedings differed in no essential character from the summary jurisdiction exercised in the townships and hundreds of Anglo-Saxon England. (For illustrations of the proceedings of the Vehmgerichte, see Sir W. Scott's Annals of Geierstein.)

II. Technically:

1. Anat. (PL): Thin ramifying elastic tubes arising in the extremities of the body, and proceeding by a more or less direct course to the heart, to which they carry back the blood sent forth by the arteries and transferred to them by the capillaries connecting the two kinds of vessels. They fall under three great divisions: the pulmonary, the systemic veins, and those constituting the portal system. The pulmonary veins consist of four short venous trunks which carry the red blood back from the lungs to the left side of the heart, and which are found two on each side in the root of the corresponding lung. The systemic veins arise by small branches, which receive the blood from the capillaries [CAPILLARY-VESSLS] throughout the body, and uniting to form larger vessels, and then two large venous trunks, the superior and inferior veinæ cavae, finally enter the right auricle of the heart, into which the coronary veins also conduct the blood which nourishes that organ itself. These systemic veins are naturally divided into two groups, according to the channel by which they enter the heart. The veins of the head, the neck, the upper limbs, the spine, the heart, and part of the walls of the thorax and abdomen, make their entrance into the right auricle by the superior veinæ cavae, while those of the lower part of the trunk and the abdominal viscera do so by the inferior veinæ cavae. The veins of the portal system bring back the blood from the stomach, the intestines, the spleen, and the pancreas; then joining, they form the great portal vein which ramifies in the surface of the liver, after the manner of an artery, before finally entering the heart by the inferior vena cava. The anastomoses of veins are much larger and more numerous than those of arteries. In many parts of the body there are two sets, one superior, the other more deeply seated, with frequent communications between the two. Some veins possess valves, while others are destitute of them. All the ramifications of veins are named; the most important will be found in this dictionary. The walls of the veins are thinner than those of the arteries, but the veins themselves are less elastic. The total capacity of the veins is much greater than that of the arteries; so much so that the veins alone can hold the mass of blood which in life is distributed over both arteries and veins. While there is a considerable pressure even in the smaller, and a greater one in the larger arteries, the pressure in veins is greatest in those of smaller bore, and even in them is but slight; hence, while a pulse is present in the arteries, it is as a rule absent in the veins. The velocity of the blood in the veins is least in those of smaller diameter and greatest in the larger trunks, which is the reverse of the rule in arteries. When a vein is cut the flow from the distal end—i.e., from the end nearest the capillaries—is continuous, but the blood is ejected with little force.

2. Bot. (Pl.): The ramifications of the petiole among the cellular tissue of a leaf, of which they constitute the framework. They are of fibro-vascular tissue, and carry sap into the parenchyma. The principal vein, that which forms the continuation of the petiole and the axis of the leaf, is called the costa or midrib, a term which Lindley proposes to extend to all main veins proceeding direct from the base to the apex of a leaf, or to the points of its lobes. The ramifications sent out by the midrib, called by some lateral ribs, he terms primary veins. They curve towards the apex, and anastomose with the back of the primary vein which lies next to them. The part of the primary vein which curves in the vicinity of this anastomosis he calls the curved vein, and those external to it the marginal veins. Veins running at right angles from the midrib and alternate with the primary veins he terms costal veins. [VEINLET, VENATION.]

3. Geol.: A crack in a rock filled up by substances different from the rock. These may be either earthy or metallic. In very many cases the fissures have been produced by volcanic or earthquake action, and they often coincide with faults. Water descending by these fissures to unknown depths has been raised to so high a temperature that it has become capable of holding in solution various metallic and other mineral substances. As the water has cooled it has gradually deposited these matters held in solution, not doing so simultaneously, but in succession. Metaliferous veins vary greatly in width, being sometimes a few inches, frequently three or four feet, and sometimes much more. The thinner portions often branch off into innumerable slender ramifications like the veins of an animal, whence their name. Sometimes part of the material filling veins has fallen in from above or been segregated from the rocks constituting the sides of the fissure. They are often parallel, are associated with dykes, and are more common in the paleozoic than in more modern strata. They vary in age, and not unfrequently one crosses another.

1. Mining:
 - (1) A lead or lode of ore-bearing rock, alive or dead; that is, containing ore or not.
 - (2) A seam of metalliferous matter filling up a former fissure in rock. [PIPE-VEIN, RAKE-VEIN.]
5. Pathol.: The chief affections to which veins are subject are: Inflammation, varix, hypertrophy, atrophy, degeneration, phlebotomy, parasites, and new growths. In surgical operations the accidental sudden entry of air often causes death by arresting the pulmonary circulation. If slowly injected an enormous quantity may be (and has been) pumped into the vein with impunity, while a quantity sufficient to fill the auricle, entering suddenly, would certainly prove fatal. The first recorded case of spontaneous entry of air in man occurred in 1707, though experiments had been made on the lower animals in the seventeenth century.

vĕ-lŏ-cĭ-pĕde, s. [Lat. velox, genit. velocis = swift, and pes, genit. pedis = a foot.] A word applied to any kind of carriage driven by the feet, and formerly to bicycles and tricycles.

The name was first used in France, towards the end of the last century, when riding on the dandy-horse became popular. The two wheels of the dandy-horse were of equal size, connected by a bar, on which a saddle was placed, and astride of which the rider sat. The impetus was given by the rider's feet touching the ground, alternately pushing and being raised. Self-propulsion was next attempted by pulling levers with the hands or treading with the feet. In this kind of velocipede there were three wheels; but it never became very popular, on account of the labor. In the year 1838, the bicycle was introduced into England from France, and was ridden by Lewis Moore and Charles Spencer. This velocipede consisted of two wheels—as the name implies—of equal size. The rider sat on a saddle connected with the backbone, and propelled himself by pressing his feet on pedals at the ends of cranks which turned the wheel. It was a great improvement on the dandy-horse; but, owing to the heavy weight of the machine, faulty bearings, and the vibration—which was so great that this form of the velocipede acquired the name of "bone-shaker"—the bicycle never became really popular until the introduction of the india-rubber tire from France. The attention of English manufacturers was now attracted towards further improvement. Mr. Starley of Coventry invented a light wheel consisting of a steel rim, grooved for the reception of the tire, with stretched spokes of this steel wire. This "tension" wheel was so light and graceful, yet strong, that it at once superseded the old one, and virtually created the modern velocipede. The size of the hind wheel was reduced and the front one enlarged, and the bicycle was finally perfected by the invention of almost frictionless "ball-bearings," in which the spindles roll between free polished steel balls. The machine, as thus developed, has been greatly added to by more recent inventions, in which the skill and ingenuity of American mechanics have borne a large share. The United States patent office possesses multitudes of models of new inventions in this field and the bicycle as now used approaches perfection. The machine formerly popular, with its tall riding wheel and diminutive hind wheel, has been superseded by the "safety" bicycle, in which the wheels are nearly of the same size, being much reduced in proportions, while the necessary velocity is obtained by the principle of "gearing up," adopted from the tricycle. The action of these machines has been further improved by the introduction of the pneumatic tire, an india-rubber air-cushion which enables the rider to go over rough ground with comparatively little concussion. Tricycles, tandem bicycles, and various other forms have been produced, but the ordinary safety bicycle has become so popular that the others are little used. There are many thousands of cyclists in the United States, and Americans have excelled alike in long distance riding, in speed, and in trick riding.

vĕ-lŏc-y-tŷ, s. [Fr. velocité, from Lat. velocitatem, accus. of velocitas, from velox, genit. velocis = swift, from the same root as velo = to fly; Sp. velocidad; Port. velocidade; Ital. velocità.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Quickness or speed in motion or movement; swiftness, rapidity, celerity, speed. (Seldom applied to the movements of animals.)

2. Physics: Rate of motion, whether fast or slow; the rate at which a body changes its position in space; the rate of change of position of a point per unit of time. Velocity is said to be accelerated when the body moving passes through a greater space in equal successive times, as in the case of bodies falling under the action of gravity; and to be retarded when a less space is passed through in each successive portion of time (See extract.)

"When a material point moves, it describes a continuous line which may be either straight or curved, and is called its path and sometimes its trajectory. Motion which takes place along a straight line is called rectilinear motion; that which takes place along a curved line is called curvilinear motion. The rate of the motion of a point is called its velocity. Velocity may be either uniform or variable; it is uniform when the point describes equal spaces or when the point describes unequal portions of its path in any equal times. Uniform velocity is measured by the number of units of space described in a given unit of time. The units commonly employed in this country are feet and seconds. Variable velocity is measured at any instant by the number of units of space a body would describe if it continued to move uniformly from that instant for a unit of time. Thus, if a body describes 15 feet in a unit of time, it is moving more quickly during its descent; suppose that at any point it has a velocity of 15 ft. per second, and at that point it is moving at the rate of 15 ft. in the next second, it would describe 15 ft. in the next second."—Gannet's Physics (ed. Atkinson), § 25.

† (1) Angular velocity: [ANGULAR.] (2) Initial velocity: The rate of movement of a body at starting; used especially of the velocity of a projectile, as it issues from a firearm.

(3) Unit of velocity: That velocity with which the unit length would be described in the unit time. (Everett: C. G. S. System of Units, ch. i., pt. ii.)

(4) Virtual velocity: [VIRTUAL.]

leaves of plants. If a leaf has only a single midrib without branches, as in many Conifers, the venation is said to be simple. The three leading types of venation are the Reticulated, Netted, or Angular, found in the exogens and a few aberrant eudogens; the Parallel, or Curved, found in all the higher endogens; and the Furcate, or Forked, characteristic of Ferns. Lindley made ten divisions: Veinless, Equal-veined, Straight-veined, Curve-veined, Netted, Ribbed, Falsely-ribbed, Radiating, Feather-veined, and Hidden-veined. Professors McCosh and Dickie considered that they had traced a connection between the ramifications of plants and their venation.

vĕn-dēt-tā, s. [Ital., from Lat. vindicta = revenge.] [VINDICTIVE.]

Anthrop.: A particular case of the wider custom of blood-fend, by which every member of a stock, or body of men between whom blood-relationship subsists, is bound to aid in taking vengeance (on the offender if possible, or on the stock to which he belongs) for a personal injury done to any of his kinsmen. The vendetta which exists in Corsica, and to a less extent in Sicily, Sardinia, and Calabria, is the practice of taking vengeance on the murderer of a relative; and this duty is imposed primarily on the next of kin, but in a less degree on all the relatives of the murdered individual. If the murderer succeeds in eluding his pursuers, then vengeance may be taken on any of his relatives. Between 1770 and 1800, when the vendetta was at its height, some 7000 murders are said to have occurred in Corsica owing to this practice of private vengeance. A law prohibiting the carrying of arms did much to put a stop to the vendetta, but the law is now repealed with the result that the number of murders is on the increase.

"It is now apparent that the vendetta represents a system which prevailed everywhere before the consolidation of society into the state, and the establishment of a police capable of protecting life and property. Venetian-architecture, s. A variety of the Gothic style, of which examples are found mainly in palaces which form a class apart amongst buildings constructed in the Italian Gothic style. In these palaces the arches of the windows and halls rest upon shafts, and terminate in intricate designs of open tracery work, as in the case of the celebrated Palace of the Doges. The arches have a wavy shape, which gives them an oriental appearance. The enrichments, moreover, display, as they usually do in Italy, different mode of treatment from that which prevails elsewhere in the Gothic style. The corners of the facades are marked by slender shafts twisted like cables. The mouldings and cornice consist merely of narrow bands, which generally rest on consoles. A method of decoration peculiar to these buildings appears to have been borrowed from Byzantine models: fine marbles of various colours of which red porphyry and green serpentine are the most frequent, are inserted in circular and angular panels and borders, and form a sort of mosaic-work. This style of ornamentation is employed both in churches and palaces. [RENAISSANCE-ARCHITECTURE.]

ven-til-á-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. ventilatio, accus. of ventilatio, from ventilatus, pa. par. of ventilo = to ventilate (q.v.).]

1. The act of fanning or blowing; the state of being fanned or blown on.

"The soil, worn with too frequent culture, must be allowed, till it has recruited its exhausted soils, and again enriched itself by the ventilations of the air." -Addison.

2. The act of ventilating; the state of being ventilated; the process of removing vitiated air from and supplying fresh air to rooms, buildings, mines, and other confined places, so as to maintain the atmosphere in such places in a constant state of purity. This may be effected either by withdrawing the foul air and permitting the fresh air to flow in and supply its place (the vacuum process); or by forcing in fresh air (the plenum process), which drives the foul air before it to the exit. A combination of both processes is also used in certain cases.

"In the ventilation of mines, a series of shafts, termed winzes, are sunk from one level to another, permitting the ascent of the more highly heated air from below, causing an ascending current; and the descent of the cooler air from outside, which traverses the various galleries, is usually found sufficient. In coal or other mines where large quantities of dangerous gases are generated, this method is inadequate, and artificial means are resorted to to produce a more powerful ascending current, and cause a more rapid circulation of air. The most simple means of doing this, and that generally employed in coal-mines, is by means of two shafts, in one of which a fire is kept up, rarifying the air, and producing a strong draught, which causes the withdrawal of the air from the set of galleries with which this, the upper shaft, is connected." -Knight: Dict. Mechanics.

The ventilator for stacks, mows, and granaries consists of a perforated air-duct which allows the heated air and moisture to pass off. The ventilator for ships is commonly a wind-sail (q.v.).

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A small cavity in an animal body; a place of organic function.

*2. The stomach.

"Whether I will or not, while I live my heart beats, and my ventricles digest what is in it." -Hale.

II. Anat.: The name given to various cavities smaller than that of the stomach. (4.) Thus the cerebrum has several ventricles, and the cerebellum one. Among these are the right and left lateral ventricles. The third ventricle is a narrow longitudinal cleft placed between the optic thalami of the cerebrum. The fourth, called also the ventricle of the cerebellum, occupies the space between the medulla oblongata in front and the cerebrum behind. The fifth, called also the ventricle of the septum, or sylvian ventricle, is situated between two laminae of the septum lucidum a thin transparent partition placed between the two lateral ventricles.

¶ Ventricles of the heart:

Anat.: Two of the four cavities into which the heart is divided. They are called the right and the left ventricles. The right or anterior ventricle occupies most of the anterior surface of the right border and a smaller part of the posterior surface. The upper and left angle, called the arterial cone or infundibulum, is prolonged in a conical form to the commencement of the pulmonary artery. The muscular wall of the right ventricle is thickest at the base, and becomes thinner towards the apex. At its base are two orifices: the auriculo-ventricular orifice, protected by the tricuspid valve, and that of the pulmonary artery, protected by the semilunar or sigmoid valves. The left or posterior ventricle occupies the left border of the heart, about a third of its extent appearing on the anterior surface, the rest being visible behind. It is longer and narrower than the right ventricle, and oval in cross-section. Its walls, except near the apex, are three times as thick as those of the right ventricle. Its two orifices are very close together. One is the left auricular, the other the aortic opening, the former protected by the bicuspid or mitral, the latter by another semilunar or sigmoid valve, while the two are separated only by the attachment of the anterior segment of the mitral valve. The ventricles receive the blood from the auricles, and transmit it to the lungs and through the aorta to the body generally. [HEART, II. 2. (1).]

vén-trí-lô-qui-sm, s. [Eng. ventriloquy]; -ism.] The act or art of speaking in such a manner as to cause the hearers to believe that the sound comes not from the person speaking, but from a different source. The name originated from the erroneous supposition that the sounds uttered were formed in the belly, whereas they are formed by the same organs as the emissions of sound commonly, viz., the larynx, the palate, the tongue, the lips, &c., only that to increase the illusion the performer moves the lips as little as possible. The art of ventriloquism depends mainly on two things: (1) The power of appreciating the value of sounds at certain given distances, or when hindered by obstacles; (2) The power of imitating or reproducing the diminished value of such sounds. Thus, to represent a man speaking outside a window, the ventriloquist should know exactly the value of such sounds inside a room if actually produced outside, and also be able to reproduce them by accurate imitation. The art of ventriloquism was known to the ancient Greeks and Romans.

Vé-nûs, s. [Lat. = the goddess of love, love; allied to Sansc. van = to love; Eng. vain.]

1. Roman Mythol.: The goddess of beauty and love, and more especially of sensual love, her principal seats being the islands of Cyprus and Cythera. This goddess is generally supposed to have been of eastern origin, and to have been the same as the Phœnician Astarte. Before her identification with the Greek Aphrodite, the daughter of Zeus and Dione, who, according to some accounts, arose from the foam of the sea, Venus was one of the least important divinities (Macrob.: Sat. I. 12.) The Romans regarded her as the progenitress of their nation, which was fabled to have sprung from Æneus, the offspring of her union with the Trojan Anchises. She was married to Vulcan, but was not remarkable for fidelity to her husband, and her amour with Adonis has been celebrated by classic poets and by Shakespeare. The rose, myrtle, and apple were sacred to her; among birds, the dove, swan, and sparrow were her favourites. She is generally represented with her son Cupid in a chariot drawn by doves, or, at other times, by swans or sparrows. Among the most famous statues of Venus are the Venus of Cnidus, by Praxiteles (of which the Venus de Medici, found at Tivoli, is supposed to be a copy), the Venus of Capua, and the Venus of Milo, or Milos, found in the island of Milos. In the best days of art she was always represented as draped, in later times nude.

2. Astron.: The second of the known inferior planets, if the arrangement be made according to their relative distances from the sun. With the exception of the moon, Venus is the nearest of all the heavenly bodies to the earth, and, when near its extreme eastern or western elongation, is much brighter than even the largest of the fixed stars. It stands first in this respect also of all the planets, the nearest approach to it being that made at certain times by Jupiter. When Venus is at its maximum of brightness, it can sometimes be seen by the naked eye in sunlight within an hour of noon. Its comparative nearness to the sun causes it to be for six months a morning and for the other six months an evening star. In the first state, it is the Lucifer of the Latins and the Phosphor of the Greeks; in the latter, it is the Hesperus of classical antiquity and of modern poetry. It undergoes phases like the moon. Father Castelli, a famous Florentine philosopher, reasoned this out, and, questioning Galileo on the subject, induced him to look with his telescope and see. On December 30, 1610, he was able to announce to Castelli that the phases had been actually discerned. They are not visible to the naked eye, to which the planet is simply a brilliant speck, too small to reveal its actual form, which is much more globular than that of the earth. Its diameter is about 7,600 miles, or about 258 miles less than that of the earth. Were man placed on the surface of Venus, the earth would look a trifle larger and brighter than Venus does to us in our sky. The mass of Venus is about three-quarters that of the earth, or rather that of the sun; its density is about 0.850 that of the earth; its specific gravity 4.81, as against 5.66, that of the earth. While a stone falling towards the earth passes through a little more than sixteen feet in the first second, it would do so to Venus throughout about thirteen feet only in the same time. The excessive brightness of Venus makes the time of its rotation somewhat doubtful; it is provisionally placed at 23 hours 21'. Its mean distance from the sun is 67,000,000, its greatest distance 67,500,000, and its least 66,600,000 miles. These numbers show that its orbit departs but slightly from a circle. Its periodic time is 224.7 mean solar days. Observation on the passage of the planet over the sun's disc is the best method of ascertaining the distance of the great luminary [TRANSIT]; it has also revealed the fact that Venus has an atmosphere, but its composition is as yet uncertain. Old observers thought they detected a satellite; modern astronomers have not confirmed this view, and believe it to have been founded on optical delusion.

Chem.: $C_9H_{19}O_4 = C_6H_3(OCH_3)_3CO.OH$. A monobasic acid discovered by Merck, in 1839, in sabadilla seeds. It is prepared by exhausting the bruised seeds with alcohol containing sulphuric acid, neutralising with milk of lime, filtering and evaporating the filtrate to dryness. It crystallizes in colourless four-sided prisms, slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol, but insoluble in ether. Heated to 100° it gives off water and becomes opaque; at a higher temperature it melts, and sublimes without decomposition.

vēr-ā-trīn, s. [Eng. veratrum; -in.]

Chem.: Veratrum-resin (q.v.).

vēr-ā-trīne, s. [Eng. veratrum; -ine.]

Chem.: $C_{32}H_{56}N_2O_8$. Veratria. An organic base discovered by Meissner, in 1818, in sabadilla seeds, and readily obtained by boiling the bruised seeds in strong alcohol, and precipitating by an alkali. In its pure state it is a white or greenish-white crystalline powder, inodorous, insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, and very poisonous; melts at 115°, and solidifies on cooling to a resinous mass. Strong sulphuric acid colours it first yellow, then carmine red, and lastly violet. It dissolves in dilute acids, forming colourless salts, which are very poisonous.

vēr-ā-trōl, s. [Eng. veratric; -ol.]

Chem.: $C_9H_{10}O_2$. A colourless oil obtained by distilling veratric acid with excess of baryta. It has an agreeable, aromatic odour, sp. gr. 1.086 at 15°, solidifies at 15°, and boils at 202°-205°.

vē-rā-trūm, s. [Lat. = a plant, Veratrum album.]

Perianth of six equal divisions, sessile, persistent; stamens six, springing from the perianth; styles three, persistent; stigmas three, spreading; capules three; seeds numerous. Plants with perennial roots, erect stems, ovate pointed leaves, and panicles of polygamous flowers. Natives of Europe and North America. Veratrum album is the White Hellebore. The stem is two to four or five feet high, the peduncles downy, the flowers in a thrice-compound panicle. It grows in the Alps of Switzerland and Savoy and in the Pyrenees. It is a powerful emetic and drastic purgative, formerly given in mania, epilepsy, &c.; externally it is used in itch. Another European species is V. nigrum, the Dark-flowered Veratrum. V. viride is the Green or American Hellebore, found on the east coast of the United States, from Canada to Carolina. It is called also the Poke-root and the Swamp Hellebore. The rhizome is a powerful cardiac, arterial, and nervous sedative, lowering the pulse, the respiration, and the heat of the body. It is used in pneumonitis, rheumatism, gout, neuralgia, asthma, and in some cardiac affections. V. Sabadilla, a Mexican and West Indian species, was formerly believed to yield Cevadilla (q.v.).

vērb, * verbe, s. [Fr. verbe, from Lat. verbum = a word, a verb; cogn. with Eng. word (q.v.).]

* I. Ord. Lang.: A word.

* In whichs speche, the verbe that enpleth the words [fleshe] and [meat] together: knitteth them together in their propre signification.—Br. Gardiner's Exposition, fol. 8.

II. Gram.: That part of speech which predicates or asserts something in regard to something else (the subject or thing spoken of): as, The man lives, the boy threw a stone, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, fāther; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn: mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. sē, cē = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

the man thinks. Verbs affirm action or existence of a subject under certain conditions or relations called voice, mood, and tense. (See these words.) Verbs may be classified into: (1) Transitive, requiring an object, as, He learns his lesson; and (2) Intransitive, as, He runs.

[ACTIVE, PASSIVE, TRANSITIVE, INTRANSITIVE.] Transitive verbs include reflexive verbs. [REFLEXIVE.] Some transitive verbs are reflexive in meaning though not in form, and appear, at first sight, as if used intransitively: as, He keeps out of danger, i.e., He keeps himself, &c. Sometimes a transitive verb has a passive sense with an active form: as, The cakes ate short and crisp. Some verbs are sometimes transitive and sometimes intransitive: as, He floats a scheme, The body floats. Only transitive verbs have a passive voice. Some intransitive verbs, by means of a preposition, become transitive, and may be used passively: as, He laughed at the act, The act was laughed at by him. Intransitive verbs include a large number that might be classed as frequentative, diminutive, inceptive, desiderative, &c. Some intransitive verbs have a causative meaning, and take an object: I run, I ran a pin into my finger. Intransitive verbs may take a noun of kindred meaning as object (called the cognate object): as, To sleep a sleep, to run a race, to live a life. Verbs used with the third person only are called impersonal verbs: as, Methinks it rains, it snows. In the case of some verbs, the transitive form is distinguished from the corresponding intransitive by a change of vowel: as, raise, rise; set, sit; fell, full. Such verbs are called causative (q.v.). The past tense of strong verbs is expressed by a change of vowel only: as, throw, threw; the past tense of weak verbs by adding to the verbal root the syllable ed: as, shout, shouted, love, loved, or its euphonic substitute d (-ed). [STRONG, WEAK.] In Middle English there were also negative forms of verbs: as, nam = ne am = am not; nis = ne is = is not; not = ne wot = not, (know) not, &c. Auxiliary verbs are used in forming the tenses of other verbs: as, I have seen. [AUXILIARY.]

"You have told me that a verb is (as every word also must be) a noun; but you added, that it is also something more; and that the title of verb was given to it on account of that distinguishing something more than the mere nouns convey."—Tobias: Diversions of Parley, pt. II, ch. viii.

vēr-nī-ēr, s. [Named after the inventor, Peter Vernier, of Brussels, who described it in a tract printed in 1631.] A contrivance for measuring fractional portions of one of the equal spaces into which a scale or limb, or a graduated instrument is divided. The vernier consists of a graduated scale, so arranged as to cover an exact number of spaces on the primary scale, or limb, to which it is applied. The vernier is divided into a number of equal parts, greater or less by 1, than the number of spaces which it covers on the limb. That applied to the barometer will illustrate its principle, a representing the mercurial column, b the vernier, and c the barometer-scale, divided into inches and tenths. The vernier-scale is 1 1/10 inches in length, and is divided into ten equal parts, each embracing 1/10 of an inch, and therefore exceeding each division of the scale by 1/10 of an inch. If, therefore, any division of the vernier coincide with a division on the scale, that division, counting downward, when the 0 of the vernier coincides with the top of the mercurial column, indicates the number of hundredths of an inch to be added to the tenths division on the scale next above which the 0 of the vernier stands.

More than 400 species are known, chiefly from the hotter parts of the western hemisphere. The seeds of Vernonia anthelmintica (= Serratula anthelmintica of Roxburgh), a plant found in the Himalayas and some other parts of India, yield an oil. The seeds themselves are a valuable tonic and stomachic, and are said to be diuretic. They are used as an anthelmintic, and brused and mixed with lime-juice to destroy pediculi. The Hindoos consider them of great use in white leprosy and other skin diseases. A decoction of V. cinerea, another Indian species, is used in India to promote perspiration.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The traditional name of the woman who was cured of an issue of blood (Mark v. 25-34), originally given as Bernice, or Berenice. The name Veronica soon came to be popularly explained as equivalent to the words vera teen = true likeness, and hence arose the legend that St. Veronica was a holy woman who wiped the perspiration from the face of the Saviour, when toiling to Calvary, upon the sudarium which she carried, and which immediately received an impression of his features. A relic, purporting to be this very napkin, is still preserved in St. Peter's at Rome. Copies of the portrait were called Veronica, or Veronicule, whence the English vernice (q.v.).

2. A copy of the portrait or impression of Our Lord's features imprinted on the sudarium of St. Veronica; a vernice.

II. Bot.: Speedwell; the typical genus of Veroniceæ. Herbs or shrubs, generally with opposite, sometimes with whorled, leaves; calyx four to five partite; corolla rotate, four cleft, the lowest segment the narrowest; stamens two; capsule two-celled. Known species about 160, from the north temperate zone and from Australia and New Zealand. Some of them grow in wet ditches and marshes, some only on the driest soil. They have usually very beautiful flowers, blue, white, or pink in color, and a number of the species are widely cultivated in flower gardens. V. virginica, a common species in the United States, is called Culver's Physic. It has actively diuretic qualities, and a decoction of the fresh root is violently cathartic and emetic. The mountains of New Zealand bear several shrubby species, peculiar but ornamental in appearance, which have been introduced into gardens. There are many European species. One of the finest is Veronica Chamædrys, frequent in May and June in woods, pastures, and on hedge-banks. Its stem has the soft hairs disposed on two opposite lines, changing their position above each joint; the leaves are wrinkled, the corolla very bright blue. V. officinalis, a pubescent plant, with a procurrent stem, ovate-serrate leaves, and spicate racemes, is abundant in woods and pastures; its bitter and astringent leaves infused make a kind of tea, which has been used medicinally. They are employed in Sweden and elsewhere for this purpose, as are also the leaves of the German Speedwell (V. chamædrys). Several peculiar and ornamental species from the mountains of New Zealand are cultivated, and prove hardy in gardens.

ver-tè-brā (pl. ver-tè-bræ), *ver-tè-bre (bre as bër), s. [Lat. = a joint, a vertebra, from verto = to turn; Fr. vertèbre; Sp., Port., & Ital. vertebra.]

Compar. Anat.: One of the bony segments of which the spine, or backbone, consists. Theoretically, a typical vertebra consists of a central piece or body, from which two arches are given off, one (the neural), protecting the nervous system, the other (the hæmal) protecting the organs of circulation, and thus corresponding to the doubly tubular structure of the body of the Vertebrata (See illustration UNDER VERTEBRATA.) In practice the second arch is only recognizable with difficulty, the parts being either absent or much modified, but a good example may be seen in the human thorax. The fundamental element of each vertebra is the body or centrum (c), from the surface of which spring two bony arches (n n), called the neural arches, or neurapophyses, because they form with the body the neural canal, which encloses the spinal cord. From the point of junction there is usually developed a spine, called the spinous process, or neural spine (s), rudimentary in the atlas or first cervical vertebra. From the neural arches are also developed the articular process or zygapophyses (a a), which aid the centra in uniting the vertebrae to each other. From the sides of the body proceed the transverse processes (d d). The number of vertebrae varies greatly in different animals. The vertebral column is divisible into distinct regions, of which the following are recognizable in the higher Vertebrata: The cervical vertebrae (seven to man), composing the neck (1); the dorsal (twelve in man), usually carrying well-developed ribs (2); the lumbar (five in man) (3). These form the cervical, dorsal, and lumbar regions respectively, and are sometimes called True Vertebrae, to distinguish them from the False Vertebrae, which consist of those in the sacral region usually ankylosed to form a single bone, the os sacrum (4), and a variable number of vertebrae forming the caudal region or tail (5). The spaces between the vertebrae are filled with an elastic substance, admitting of an amount of motion, which, though slight between each pair, is in the aggregate sufficient to give the spinal column considerable flexibility. The vertebrae and their projections or processes afford attachments for a number of muscles and ligaments, and passages for blood-vessels and for the nerves passing out of the spinal cord.

Zool.: A division of the Animal Kingdom, instituted by Lamarck, comprising animals in which the body is composed of a number of definite segments [VERTEBRA], arranged along a longitudinal axis; the nervous system is in its main masses dorsal, and the neural and hæmal regions of the body are always completely separated by a partition; the limbs are never more than four in number; generally there is a bony axis known as the spine or vertebral column, and a notochord is always present in the embryo, though it may not persist in adult life. A specialized hæmal system is present in all, and in all but Amphioxus there is a heart with never less than two chambers, and in the higher vertebrates with four. The Vertebrata are usually divided into five classes: Pisces, Amphibia, Reptilia, Aves, and Mammalia, and many attempts have been made to gather these classes into groups. One plan is to divide them into Branchiata (Fishes and Amphibians), because at some portion of their life they are provided with gills, and Abranchiata (Reptiles, Birds, and Mammals), having no gills. The latter are sometimes called Amniots or Allantoidea, because the embryo is provided with an amnion and an allantols, while both these are absent in the Branchiata, which are therefore called Anamniota or Anallantoidea. Owen made two sections: Hematocterya, or Cold-blooded Vertebrates (Fishes, Amphibia, and Reptiles), and Hematotherma, or Warm-blooded Vertebrates (Birds and Mammals); and Huxley three: Ichthyopsida (Fishes and Amphibia), Sauropsida (Reptiles and Birds), and Mammalia. A later classification is to treat all the Vertebrata as a division of a larger group, Chordata, distinguished by (1) the temporary or permanent possession of a rod (the notochord) underlying the central dorsally-placed nervous system; and (2) the temporary or permanent presence of visceral clefts (q.v.). The Chordata are divided into three groups: (1) Cephalochordata, in which the notochord, pointed at the extremities, extends from one end of the body to the other; (2) Urochordata (q.v.), and (3) the true Vertebrata, or Craniata, in which the anterior end of the central nervous system is enlarged into a brain, which becomes surrounded and protected by a cartilaginous capsule or skull.

The sacred fire, said to have been brought by Æneas from Troy, burned perpetually on her altar, and was tended by the Vestal Virgins. The fire was never willingly permitted to expire; but if such an accident occurred through neglect, it was considered an omen of the worst description, and required the most careful and solemn expiations. In the Augustan age Vesta was represented as a personification of Terra, or the Earth, and at a later period she was confounded with Ops, Rhea, Cybele, Bona Dea, and Maia. Her festivals, called Vestalia, were celebrated June 8th.

Vestal Virgins, s. pl.

Roman Mythol.: The name given to the virgin priestesses who had charge of the temple of the goddess Vesta, at Rome, and the superintendence of the sacred fire which blazed perpetually on her altar. Their number was originally four, but was afterwards increased to six; and the period of their service extended to thirty years. The first ten years were spent in acquiring a knowledge of their duties, the second in discharging them, and the third in instructing the novices. During the whole of this time they were bound to continue in a state of maidenhood; but, at the expiration of the period, they were free to return to the world, and even to marry if they thought fit. When a vacancy occurred in their number, it was filled up by the Pontifex Maximus, to whose control they were subject. If, however, through carelessness, they allowed the sacred fire to be extinguished, they were chastised with rods by the Pontifex Maximus, and, if any of them violated their vows of chastity, they were condemned to be buried alive in the Campus Sceleratus. The abolition of the Vestal Virgins was effected in the reign of Theodosius.

"The institution of the vestal virgins is generally attributed to Numa; though we meet with the sacred fire long before, and even in the times of Æneas."—Kennett: Antiquities of Rome, bk. II, bk. II, ch. vi.

One possessing these rights is said to be vested in interest.

It was formerly held that Christian vestments were derived from those of the Jewish priests, but more probably they are only developments from the ordinary dress of the early Christians. The Roman Church makes use of five colours: White (for feasts of Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, Virgins, and Confessors), red (for feasts of the Holy Ghost and Martyrs), green (for ferias), purple (in Lent and Advent), and black (in masses for the dead). By the decision in the Folkestone Ritual case (1877), the use of Eucharistic vestments is forbidden in the English Church.

3. A meeting of the parishioners of a parish to consult on parochial business. So called from the place of meeting being properly the vestry of the parish church. In this country only church affairs are discussed at such meetings—the term vestry being employed only in the Protestant Episcopal Church. In England it has a wider application. There the vestry of a parish consists generally of the minister, churchwardens, and chief men of the parish; and the minister, whether rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, is ex officio chairman of the meetings. Vestries are of two sorts: (1) General (or ordinary), and (2) Select. A general (or ordinary) vestry is one to which every parishioner or out-dweller assented to or paying poor-rates has a right of admission. Its powers extend to the investigation into and restraint of the expenditure of the parish funds, the repair, alteration, or enlarging of the churches or chapels within the parish, the appointment of certain officers, as vestry-clerk, overseers, &c. A select vestry is one elected annually in certain large and populous places by the ratepayers, with powers and duties similar to those of local boards.

In the United States the President may veto all measures passed by congress, but after such right has been exercised, the rejected measures may be passed over the veto if carried by two-thirds of each house of congress. In Great Britain the right of veto belongs to the Crown, but has not been exercised since 1701.

"The Crown had no administrative or executive responsibility, and never exercised the right of veto which that House did, and it was the veto of the Prime Minister."—Lord Rosebery, in Times, March 19, 1883.

3. The word whereby forbiddal was expressed in certain political assemblies, where the official language was more or less Latin, and where a single voice on the negative side could prevent the passing of a resolution otherwise unanimous; the Liberum Veto, or Free Veto, of the Polish Diets being the most famous historical instance of it. (Latham.)

4. Hence, any authoritative prohibition, refusal, negative, or interdict.

Veto Act, s.

Scottish Church: An Act of the General Assembly passed on May 27, 1834, by 184 to 138 votes. It provided that when a patron issued a presentation to a parish in favour of a minister or probationer, the disapproval of the presbytery by a majority of male heads of families being communicants, should be deemed sufficient ground for his rejection, it being enacted that no objection should be valid unless the person making it was prepared to state before the Presbytery that he was not actuated by factious or malicious motives, but solely by a conscientious regard to the spiritual interests of himself or the congregation. The passing of this Act was one of the chief causes of the Disruption (q.v.).

¶ Vexation springs from a variety of causes, acting unpleasantly on the inclinations or passions of men; mortification is a strong degree of vexation, which arises from particular circumstances acting on particular passions. Vexation arises principally from the crossing our wishes and views; mortification from the hurting our pride and self-importance; chagrin from a mixture of the two: disappointments are always attended with more or less vexation, according to the circumstances which give pain and trouble; an exposure of our poverty may be more or less of a mortification, according to the value which we set on wealth and grandeur; a refusal of our request will produce more or less of chagrin as it is accompanied with circumstances more or less mortifying to our pride.

II. Technically:

1. Physics: The reciprocating motion of a body, as of a pendulum, a musical chord, elastic plate, the air or ether. The term oscillation is, however, more frequently used to denote a slow reciprocating motion, as that of a pendulum which is produced by the action of gravity on the whole mass of the body; while vibration is generally confined to a motion having quick reciprocations, as that of a sonorous body, and proceeding from the reciprocal action of the molecules of the body on each other when their state of equilibrium has been disturbed.

vi-brī'-ō, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. vibro = to shake, to quiver.]

* 1. Zool.: The type-genus of Ehrenberg's Vibrionidæ (q.v.). It approximately corresponds to the modern genus Anguillula (q.v.). Used also of any individual of the genus.

* 2. Bot.: According to Cohn, a genus of Schizomycetes, but Grove (Bacteria & Yeast Fungi) classes that genus and Ophidionomas (Ehrenberg) with Spirillum, which he thus defines: Cells cylindrical or slightly compressed, simply arcuate, or spirally twisted, rigid, with a flagellum at each end (doubtful in some species). Multiplication by transverse division, the daughter-cells for the most part soon separating. At times, also, a zoogloea is formed. The species are found in infusions, in brackish water, and in the slime of the teeth. Zopf asserted that minute spherical "cocci," short rodlets ("bacteria"), longer rodlets ("bacilli"), and filamentous ("leptothrix") forms, as well as curved and spiral threads ("vibrio," "spirillum"), &c., occur as vegetative stages in one and the same Schizomycete. (Encyc. Brit. (ed 9th), xxi. 399.)

"It may be noted that Vibrio is here [i.e., in Ehrenberg's Die Infusions-Aerchen, t. 75] conceived to be naturally straight-lined, but capable of bending in undulations of a serpentine form, being thus distinguished from Spirillum by the fact that the undulations lie all in one plane. But most modern observers are agreed that the species referred to Vibrio belong to two classes—the one, in which the undulations are serpentine, being merely Bacillus; the other, in which they are spiral, being indistinguishable from Spirillum. This is, therefore, another reason . . . why the name Vibrio should be dropped."—W. B. Grove: Bacteria & Yeast Fungi, p. 62.

† vi-brī-ōn'-al, a. [Mod. Lat. vibrío, genit. vibrion(is); Eng. suff. -al.] Of, belonging to, or induced by vibríos. In the last sense the word is incorrectly employed, the fungi of the genus Spirillum and the lapsed genus Vibrio not being pathogenous.

vī-bris-sæ, s. pl. [Lat. = the small hairs in the nostrils, so called, according to Festus, because their extraction causes a person to shake his head.]

Biol.: Hairs or bristles attached to the lips of many mammals, and especially developed in the Carnivora and Rodentia. The vibrissæ are organs of touch, and give warning of external obstacles, and branches of the fifth pair of nerves are distributed to their roots. Cats are rendered unable to catch mice when their whiskers are removed, and various experiments have shown that rabbits, without the assistance of their eyes, can by means of these hairs find an outlet in narrow passages. Popularly known as Smellers and Whiskers. In many birds the nasal apertures are covered with stiff, imperfect feathers (also called bristles), to which the name Vibrissæ is sometimes applied. These, however, are not organs of touch, but serve to prevent the nostrils becoming obstructed by dust.

vī-brō-scōpe, s. [Eng. vibration], and Gr. σκοπεῖν (skopeō) = to see, to observe.] An instrument invented by Duhamel for graphically recording the vibrations of a tuning-fork, by means of an attached style on a piece of smoked paper gummed around a cylinder. The fork is made to vibrate, and the cylinder turned, the style making a mark whose waves correspond to the number of vibrations in a second.

Shrubs or trees with opposite branches, simple leaves, and terminal or axillary panicles of white or pink flowers; calyx limb five-cleft, corolla campanulate or funnel-shaped, five-lobed; stamens five, stigmas three, sessile, ovary one- to three-celled; fruit an inferior one-seeded berry. Species numerous; two United States species, Viburnum edule and V. corymbosum, nearly allied to the European Guelder Rose (V. opulus), produce berries agreeably acid in taste, which are used like cranberries. The berries of V. lantana, the Wayfaring tree, have medicinal properties. The wood is white and hard and is prized by turners. The fruit of the Common Guelder Rose is eaten in Sweden and Norway with honey and flour. The branches yield a yellow dye. [GUELDER-ROSE.] V. Tinus is the Lauræntium (q.v.). An oil extracted from the seeds of V. coriaceum, a large Himalayan shrub, is used by the Nepalese for food and for burning. The fruit of V. cotinifolium, V. foetens, V. neruosum, and V. stellatum, Himalayan shrubs, are eaten by the natives. The wood of V. erubescens, a small Himalayan tree, is very hard, close, and even-grained.

2. Canon Law: The priest of a parish, the predial tithes of which are impropriated or appropriated; that is, belong to a chapter or religious house, or to a layman who receives them and allows the vicar only the smaller tithes or a salary. [RECTOR.]

"These appropriating corporations, or religious houses, were wont to depute one of their own body to perform divine service in those parishes of which the society was thus the person. This officiating minister was in reality no more than a curate, deputy, or vicegerent of the appropriator, and, therefore, called vicarius or vicar."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. I, ch. 12.

Vicar of Christ: A title in the early Church common to all bishops, but now confined to the Pope.

Roman Church: A name formerly given to a bishop or archbishop, generally of some remote see, to whom the Pope delegated a portion of his authority, or to any ecclesiastic invested with power to exercise episcopal jurisdiction in some place where the ordinary was for some reason incapable of discharging his duties efficiently. Now vicars-apostolic, who are nearly always titular bishops, are appointed where no episcopate has been established, or where the succession has been interrupted. There are at present over a hundred of such vicariates in existence. The Church in England was governed by vicars-apostolic from 1685 till the re-establishment of the hierarchy by Pope Pius IX. in 1850.

The chief duty of vicars-forane is to maintain ecclesiastical discipline, report to the bishop on the lives of the clergy, and to preside at their local conferences. The first Council of Westminster (1852) adds to these the care of sick priests, the administration of Church property, and the maintenance of sacred buildings. In Ireland almost their sole function is to grant episcopal dispensations for the non-publication of banns.

1. Roman Church: A clerk, usually (but not necessarily) in holy orders, and having a degree in canon law, appointed by a bishop to assist in the discharge of episcopal functions. In matters of jurisdiction the vicar-general is regarded as the ordinary, and there is no appeal from the former to the latter; but the vicar-general may not do any of those things which belong to the episcopal order. A bishop is not obliged to appoint a vicar-general, but may appoint two or more if necessary. The office corresponds closely to that of an archdeacon (q.v.) in the early and mediæval church.

2. Anglican Church: An officer employed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other bishops to assist in such matters as ecclesiastical causes and visitations.

It was first discovered by the botanist Henke in 1801; Bonpland afterwards met with it. Orbigny, in 1828, sent home specimens to Paris; others also subsequently saw it growing, but it excited no attention till, in 1837, Sir Robert Schomburgk found it in the Berbice River in British Guiana. The rootstock is thick and fleshy, the leaf-stalks prickly, the leaf petate, its margin circular, its diameter from six to twelve feet, the edge so turned up as to make the leaves floating in traquill water look like a number of large trays. The leaves are green above, and covered with small bosses, below they are deep purple or violet; the undeveloped flowers are pyriform; the sepals four, each about seven inches long by four broad, purple externally, whitish internally; the petals numerous, in several rows, passing insensibly into stamens, fragrant, the outer ones white, the inner ones roseate; stamens numerous, the outer fertile, the inner sterile; ovary many celled, cup-shaped above, with many small stigmas along its upper margin; fruit a prickly berry. A native of South American rivers, especially the tributaries of the Amazon. It has been introduced into the United States and other countries. The seeds are said to be eatable, and the plant is in consequence called Water Maize by the natives of the region where it grows.

I. Botany:

(1) The genus Vitis (q.v.), and spec. Vitis vinifera, the Common or Grape Vine. It is a climbing plant furnished with tendrils. The leaves are lobed, pinnately toothed, naked, or downy; the flowers, as in other species, small, greenish, in panicles opposite the leaves; its berries, called grapes, oval, large, juicy, growing in clusters or bunches, are the finest of fruits. The native country of the vine is the region south of the Caspian Sea, Armenia, and the adjacent regions, extending perhaps to the north-western Himalaya. From a very early period, it was cultivated in Western Asia and Egypt (Gen. ix. 20, 21; xl. 10), whence it has spread to all the parts of the world suitable for its cultivation. It thrives best on the sunny sides of hills between 32° and 50° N. Its fruit is made into wine or brandy; the dried fruits of some varieties constitute raisins (RAISIN), while those of another variety are the currants of commerce (CURRANT). The eastern United States is richer in species of the vine than any other part of the world, having seven or eight species, four of which have yielded promising cultivated varieties. These are the Northern Fox-grape (V. vulpina), the Muscadine, or Southern Fox-grape (V. rotundifolia), the summer grape (V. rotundifolia), and the Winter, Chicken or Frost grape (V. cordifolia). Many valuable varieties have been produced by cultivation, as the Concord, Catawba, Delaware, &c. In California the European grape has been introduced, and is extensively cultivated, much wine being made.

(2) The long slender stem of any plant that trails along the ground, or climbs and supports itself by winding round a fixed object, or by seizing any fixed thing by its tendrils, or clasps: as a hop vine, a cucumber vine, &c.

Vegetable Pathol.: Any disease attacking the vine, spec.:

(1) That produced by the attacks of Oidium Tuckeri. [VINE-MILDEW.] In general it forms a white and very delicate cottony layer upon the leaves, young shoots, and young grapes of the vine, which soon causes them to be covered by brown spots, and then become first inflated and finally destroyed. The fruit becomes abortive, or dwarfed and juiceless, and decay follows. There is a predisposition to the disease in certain states of the atmosphere. It first broke out in Kent in 1845, whence it spread to the continent of Europe, to Madeira, and to the English vines introduced into America, though American vines themselves escaped. Soon after its appearance, Mr. Tucker, a gardener at Margate, was the first to try sulphur as a remedy. It is still the best known, and the fungus has been named after its human destroyer.

(2) A disease of the vine produced by an aphid, Phylloxera vastatrix. [PHYLOXERA.] The parasites cause the roots to swell, and finally to be incapable of discharging their functions, so that the plant wastes away or perishes. They are as difficult to destroy as other aphides. Phylloxera is a native of America, but has been exported to Europe, where it has caused great ravages in the vineyards, almost annihilating the vine in some districts of France. As a means of overcoming its effects, the stocks of some of the hardy American species have been planted, and grafted with the European vine. This method has proved very successful.

vin-é-gar, vin-é-gör, vin-e-gre, vin-e-gre, s. & a. [Lit. = sour wine, from Fr. vin aigre = vinegar, from vin = wine, and aigre = sharp, sour.]

A. As substantive:

1. Lit.: A weak solution of acetic acid, containing in most cases a certain proportion of extractive matter and mineral salts, according to the source from which it has been derived. Malt vinegar contains from four to six per cent. of real acetic acid, which is produced by the action of the acetous ferment on a fermented extract of malt and grain. It is usually of a deep red-brown colour, and is the kind of vinegar most esteemed by the public. Wine vinegar made in France by the acetification of poor and weak wines, contains usually the same amount of acetic acid as malt vinegar, but possesses a different flavour. A great deal of French vinegar is prepared from crabs or sour apples, but it has neither the flavour nor the strength of that made from wine. Cider vinegar, largely used in the cider districts of this country, is prepared by adding sugar to a very acid cider, and allowing it to stand in a warm room for some time, or is simply expressed from crab apples, when it is known as crab-vinegar. German vinegar is made by passing weak alcohol over wood shavings in presence of air. The acetification proceeds much more rapidly than in the case of malt vinegar, but the flavour is not so good. Distilled vinegar (white vinegar), i.e., malt or wine vinegar, which has been subjected to distillation, contains from five to seven per cent. of acetic acid, and also some of the essential principles present in the vinegar from which it is derived. Wood vinegar is crude acetic acid produced in the destructive distillation of wood. When highly purified and diluted, it is not infrequently used as white vinegar. [ACETIC-ACID.] Vinegar is largely used as a condiment in cookery, salads, &c., and as a preservative ingredient in pickles. Taken internally, it is a refrigerant. Much diluted, it may be used to sponge the body in fever, to check excessive perspiration, and as an ingredient in cooling lotions.

2. Fig.: Anything really or metaphorically sour; sourness of temper.

"There's vinegar and pepper in it."—Shakep.: Twelfth Night, III. 4.

B. As adj.: Sour, crabbed.

Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable."
Shakep.: Merchant of Venice, I. 1.

Music: A stringed instrument a little larger than the violin; it was furnished in England with five or six strings, had a fretted finger-board, and was played with a bow. The viol is found depicted in MSS. as early as the eleventh century. In France, Germany, and Italy the number of the strings varied between three and six. It is supposed that they were tuned in fourths and thirds. A chest of viola consisted of six instruments of various sizes, the smaller ones were called in England treble, the next mean, and the larger bass viols: the treble viol was somewhat larger than the violin, and the music for it was written in the treble clef; the mean (or tenor) viol was about the same length and breadth as the modern tenor violin, but was thicker in the body; its music was written in the C clef.

The bass viol was much about the same size as the violoncello, and the music for it was written in the bass clef. "His heart danced to the melody of the harp and the viol; he pampers every bodily sense, till pleasure itself is converted into pain or insensibility."—Knox: Christian Philosophy, § 56.

vī-ō-lā (2), s. [Lat. = a violet.]

Bot.: Violet; the typical genus of Violaceae (q.v.). Low herbs, more rarely shrubs, with radical or alternate leaves or flowers; on one, rarely on two-flowered peduncles; calyx of five sepals, extended at the base; petals five, unequal, the under one spurred at the base; anthers connate, two of them spurred behind; capsule of three elastic valves; seeds ovoid or globose. Known species about two hundred, from temperate countries. Several of these are cultivated in gardens, some of them, as V. tricolor, known by the several popular names of Pansy, Pansy Violet, and Heart's Ease, being admired for the beauty of their flowers; others, as V. odorata, the Sweet-scented Violet, for their delicate perfume. There are a number of species native to the United States, of which V. cucullata, the common Blue Violet, is much the best known. Other common species are V. palmata, the Hand-leaf Violet, and V. pedata, the Bird-foot Violet, which bears large and handsome blue or purple flowers. There are several species of white and yellow violets, the latter including V. rotundifolia and V. pubescens. Of the white species, V. blanda bears small white flowers with a faint, sweet perfume. There are species with green flowers, belonging to a second genus, Solea. The cultivated violets are principally of Old World species, notably the Pansy and the Sweet-scented Violet. The Pansy is remarkable for its great diversity of coloration, and there is no more admired garden flower. The bruised leaves of V. tricolor smell like peach kernels; they were once believed to be efficacious in the cure of skin diseases. The petals of V. odorata are used as a laxative for children. The seeds have similar qualities, and the root is emetic and purgative. V. verpersi, a small, procurrent, Himalayan herb, yields an oil. The flowers are considered diaphoretic and laxative, the seeds diuretic and emetic.

Roots often emetic. Found in most continents, but the typical species are from the North Temperate Zone. Tribes or sub-orders two: Violales and Alsoeae. - vī-ō-ļin (1), s. [Ital. violino, dimin. from viola = a viol (q.v.).]

Music: The most familiar of all stringed instruments played with a bow. It is somewhat smaller than the old viol, as its name implies. Like the rest of the family it represents, it consists of a wooden chest of peculiar form, made of two curved surfaces, called the back and the belly, united by sides, and with a hollow on each side half-way in the length. A neck at one end serves as a finger-board, over which the four strings pass, being fastened at one end of the chest or body to a tail-piece, and kept in tune and position by a series of pegs at the head or end of the neck. The strings are raised above the belly by the bridge, supported at the point of greatest tension by a sound-post, which is fixed upright between the back and the belly. In the belly are two holes, called the f holes from their similarity to the shape of that letter. The sound is produced by drawing a bow of horsehair charged with rosin across the strings, which are tuned in fifths, the changes of pitch being gained by "stopping" the strings with the fingers of the left-hand against the finger-board, thus shortening the vibrating portion of the string. The harmonics of the violin are very telling in quality, and are produced by touching the strings lightly instead of pressing them upon the finger-board. The sordino or mute, placed upon the bridge, produces a peculiar modification of tone, and a special effect is gained by plucking the strings, as in playing a guitar. [PIZZICATO.] The violin is capable of producing a limited harmony by means of double stops and bowing in "arpeggio," while as to power of expression and execution there is no other instrument which can be compared to it. It has a wide range of sounds, to which any degree of loudness or softness, staccato or legato, can be given. Compass from a below the staff. [CREMONA.]

virtual-image, s.

Optics: (See extract).

"There are two cases relative to the direction of rays reflected by mirrors according as the rays after reflection are convergent or divergent. In the first case the reflected rays do not meet, but if they are supposed to be produced on the other side of the mirror, their prolongations coincide in the same point. The eye is then affected, but as if the rays proceeded from this point, and it sees an image. But the image has no real existence, the luminous rays do not come from the other side of the mirror; this appearance is called the virtual image. The images of real objects produced by plane mirrors are of this kind.—Gannot: Physics (ed. Atkinson), § 506.

Mech.: The velocity which a body in equilibrium would actually acquire during the first instant of its motion in case of the equilibrium being disturbed. The proposition known as the Principle of Virtual Velocities is thus stated:

"Suppose a system of forces in equilibrium, and imagine the points of application of the forces to undergo very slight displacements, then the algebraical sum of the products of such force into its virtual velocity vanishes; conversely, if this sum is not zero for all possible displacements, the system of forces is in equilibrium."

Suppose that A is the point of application of a force P; conceive the point A to be moved in any direction to a new position, a, at a very slight distance, and from a draw a perpendicular, a p, on the line of action of the force P; then A p is called the virtual velocity of the point A with respect to the force P; and the complete phrase is abbreviated, sometimes into "the virtual velocity of the point A," and sometimes into "the virtual velocity of the force P." The virtual velocity is considered to be positive or negative according as p falls in the direction of P or in the opposite direction. Thus in the figure the virtual velocity is positive. (Todhunter.)
